(1) 88-1128

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
JAN 7 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No.

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Petitioner,

VS.

ANTONE FOLKINS, et al.,
Respondents.

On Writ of Certiorari to the California Supreme Court

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

JOHN K. VAN DE KAMP
Attorney General for the
State of California

R. H. CONNETT
Assistant Attorney General

RODERICK E. WALSTON*
CHARLES W. GETZ IV
BRUCE S. FLUSHMAN
MARY E. HACKENBRACHT
Deputy Attorneys General

350 McAllister Street
Suite 6000
San Francisco, CA 94102
(415) 557-3920

Attorneys for Petitioner
People of the State
of California

*Counsel of Record

BOWNE OF SAN FRANCISCO, INC. • 190 NINTH ST. • S.F., CA 94103 • (415) 864-2300

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

A presidential executive order, issued several decades after California's admission to statehood, created an Indian reservation on lands appurtenant to a navigable river in California, but excluded the river itself from the reservation. The California Supreme Court held that the executive order, although preserving California's "title" to the river bed and its fish resources, "reserved" to the Indians the right to commercially fish in violation of California law.

The questions presented are:

1. Whether the reserved rights doctrine, which authorizes the United States to reserve unappropriated water for use on appurtenant reserved lands, should be expanded to allow Indian commercial fishing rights in a navigable river that the State of California holds in trust for all the people of California.

2. Whether a post-statehood executive order creating an Indian reservation on lands appurtenant to a navigable river, but excluding the river itself from the reservation in recognition of the State's sovereign title to the river and its fish resources, should nevertheless be construed as reserving Indian commercial fishing rights.

PARTIES

The petitioners are the People of the State of California, the real party in interest below. The respondents are Antone Folkins and Kenneth Mattz.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
Questions Presented	i
Opinions Below	1
Jurisdiction	1
Applicable Federal Laws	2
Statement of the Case	2
1. Background of the Controversy	2
2. The Proceedings Below	4
Argument	7
Introduction and Summary of Argument	7
I. The 1891 executive order creating the Klamath River Indian reservation could not and did not convey Indian commercial fishing rights, and the California Supreme Court ignored this Court's precedents in ruling otherwise	11
II. The California Supreme Court improperly expanded the reserved rights doctrine to include Indian commercial fishing	15
III. The California Supreme Court failed to determine whether Indian commercial fishing is a "primary" or "secondary" reservation purpose, or otherwise to qualitatively analyze federal, state and tribal interests	17
IV. The presidential executive order creating the Indian reservation specifically excluded the river from the reservation in recognition of California's sovereign interests in the river and its fish resource, and therefore did not reserve Indian commercial fishing rights	19
Conclusion	23

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases

Page

Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546 (1963) 8, 15, 17, 18
Arnett v. Five Gill Nets, 48 Cal.App.3d 454, cert. denied 425 U.S. 907 (1975) 3
Board of Commissioners v. Seber, 318 U.S. 705 (1943)... 17
Cappaert v. United States, 426 U.S. 128 (1976) 15, 16, 18
Choctaw Nation v. Oklahoma, 397 U.S. 620 (1970)..... 12
DeCoteau v. District County Court, 420 U.S. 425 (1975) 22
Department of Game v. Puyallup Tribe, 391 U.S. 392 (1968) 13
Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 213 (1913) 22
Harrison v. Fite, 148 Fed. 781 (8th Cir. 1906) 15
Indians of California v. United States, 98 Ct.Cl. 583 (1943) 13, 14
Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U.S. 240 (1891) 12
Martin v. Waddell, 41 U.S. 367 (1841) 11
Mattz v. Arnett, 412 U.S. 481 (1973)..... 3
McCready v. Virginia, 94 U.S. 391 (1876).....8, 12
Metlakatla Indians v. Egan, 369 U.S. 45 (1962) 13
Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544 (1981) 12
People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517, cert. denied 469 U.S. 1062 (1984 .....3, 5, 6
People v. Ward Redwood Co., 225 Cal.App.2d 385 (1964). 15
Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. 212 (1845) 8, 11
Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475 (1973) 10
Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U.S. 1 (1894) ..... passim
United States v. Holt State Bank, 270 U.S. 49 (1926).... 12
United States v. New Mexico, 438 U.S. 696 (1978) 9, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21
United States v. Oregon, 295 U.S. 1 (1935) 11
United States v. Utah, 420 U.S. 304 (1975) 15

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES

Page

United States v. Winans, 198 U.S. 371 (1905) 8, 10, 13, 14, 16

Washington v. Washington State Commercial Ass'n, 443 U.S. 658 (1979) 13

Winters v. United States, 207 U.S. 564 (1908) 15, 16, 17

Statutes

Cal. Fish & Game Code §§ 8434, 8685.6 ..... 2, 4

Cal. Harbor & Nav. Code § 103 15

25 C.F.R. §§ 250.1-250.23 3

18 U.S.C. § 1162 3

28 U.S.C.:

§ 1257(3) 1

§ 1360 3

Other Authorities

1 Kappler, Indian Affairs: Laws and Treaties 815 ... 2, 3, 19, 21

I Ops. Solicitor, U.S. Dept. of Interior, 1917-1974, at 945-948 (March 13, 1940) 14

No.

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Petitioner,

VS.

ANTONE FOLKINS, et al.,
Respondents.

On Writ of Certiorari to the California Supreme Court

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

OPINIONS BELOW

The decision of the California Supreme Court is reported at 46 Cal.3d 355 and 250 Cal.Rptr. 278, and is reprinted at Appendix 1. The decision of the California Court of Appeal is reported at 195 Cal.App.3d 431 and 240 Cal.Rptr. 723, and is reprinted at Appendix 31. The decision of the California Superior Court has not been officially reported, and is reprinted at Appendix 45.

JURISDICTION

The decision of the California Supreme Court was filed and entered on August 22, 1988. App. 1. A petition for rehearing was filed on September 6, 1988, and was denied on October 13, 1988. App. 47. The California Supreme Court decision is now final. This Court has jurisdiction to review the decision by writ of certiorari under 28 U.S.C. § 1257(3).

APPLICABLE FEDERAL LAWS

Presidential Executive Order, October 14, 1891:

> "It is hereby ordered that the limits of the Hoopa Valley Reservation in the State of California, a reservation duly set apart for Indian purposes, as one of the Indian reservations authorized to be set apart, in said State, by Act of Congress approved April 18, 1864, (13 Stat., 39), be and the same are hereby extended so as to include a tract of country one mile in width on each side of the Klamath River, and extending from the present limits of the Hoopa Valley reservation to the Pacific Ocean; Provided, however, That any tract or tracts included within the above described boundaries to which valid rights have attached under the laws of the United States are hereby excluded from the reservation as hereby extended.
>
> BENJ. HARRISON."

1 Kappler, Indian Affairs: Laws and Treaties 815.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

1. Background of the Controversy

This case presents a long-standing controversy concerning the State of California's jurisdiction to regulate Indian commercial fishing in the lower Klamath River, a navigable waterway that the State of California holds in trust for all its citizens. This portion of the river serves as a gateway for a valuable but fragile chinook salmon resource that predominantly spawns in upstream areas and migrates to the Pacific Ocean and back. To conserve the salmon resource, the California Legislature has prohibited all commercial fishing in the river since the mid-1930's. Cal. Fish & Game Code §§ 8434, 8685.6.

In 1891, long after California was admitted to statehood, President Benjamin Harrison issued an executive order creating an Indian reservation "to include a tract of country one mile in width on each side of the Klamath River," extending from the mouth of the river to another reservation located approximately 45 miles upstream. 1 Kappler, Indian Affairs: Laws and Treaties

815 (hereinafter "Kappler"). The executive order specifically excluded the river itself from the reservation in recognition of California's sovereign trust title to the river and its fish resource. See pages 19-22, infra.[1] [2]

---

[1] In Mattz v. Arnett, 412 U.S. 481 (1973), this Court held that an 1892 congressional act opening up surplus reservation lands for entry and settlement did not terminate the reservation itself. On remand, the California Court of Appeal held that Public Law 280, 18 U.S.C. § 1162, 28 U.S.C. § 1360, which authorizes certain states to exercise limited civil and criminal jurisdiction over Indian reservations, does not grant authority to California to regulate Indian fishing in the Klamath River. Arnett v. Five Gill Nets, 48 Cal.App.3d 454, cert. denied 425 U.S. 907 (1975). Neither Mattz nor Five Gill Nets considered or decided whether the Indians possess "reserved" commercial fishing rights that constrain California's sovereign trust authority over the Klamath River fish resource, which is the issue raised in this petition.

[2] In 1977, the Secretary of the Interior adopted regulations prohibiting Indian commercial fishing in the Klamath River. 44 Fed. Reg. 9599 (Feb. 14, 1979), as amended and codified, 25 C.F.R. §§ 250.1-250.23. In People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517, 534-536, cert. denied 469 U.S. 1062 (1984), the California Supreme Court held that the Secretary's regulations preempt California law as applied to Indian commercial fishing. The Court, however, did not specifically consider whether the Indians possess "reserved" commercial fishing rights that constrain California's sovereign trust authority over the fish resource, or whether the 1891 executive order excluded the river itself from the reservation (notwithstanding that California raised these issues before the Court). Instead, the Court assumed that the Indians have commercial fishing rights under federal law, stating simply, and without analysis, that "the creation of a reservation for Indian purposes encompasses the right to fish on the reservation." 36 Cal.3d at 534 n. 22. Therefore, McCovey's holding that the Secretary's regulations have a preemptive effect is based on the Court's assumed premise that the Indians have commercial fishing rights under federal law. If, as this petition argues, the Indians do not have "reserved" commercial fishing rights under federal law, California law necessarily applies to Indian fishing and the Secretary would lack authority to adopt regulations that have a preemptive effect. Therefore, this petition, rather than seeking to adjudicate an issue decided in McCovey, challenges the assumed premise of that decision.

2. The Proceedings Below

In September 1981, the People brought a criminal action against the respondents,[3] charging them with violating and conspiring to violate California law by taking Klamath River salmon for commercial purposes by use of gill nets. Cal. Fish & Game Code §§ 8434, 8685.6; App. 1-2. The evidence at the preliminary hearing indicated that the respondents had sold thousands of pounds of gill-netted Klamath River salmon to an undercover federal agent—posing as a commercial fish dealer—in several transactions extending over several weeks. RT 28-80.

The magistrate granted the respondents' motion to dismiss, ruling that the river is included in the reservation and that the People cannot enforce their laws within reservation waters. App. 2. The People appealed to the Superior Court, arguing that (1) the State has the right to regulate Indian commercial fishing because the State has sovereign trust title to the fish resource under the equal footing doctrine, and also because the 1891 executive order excluded the river from the reservation in recognition of the State's sovereign trust title; (2) the State has the right to regulate Indian commercial fishing for conservation purposes under its police power; and (3) State law applies to Indians who sell fish off the reservation in any event. App. 2. The Superior Court upheld the People's off-reservation sales argument without reaching the People's sovereign trust title argument or police power argument, and reversed the magistrate's decision. App. 45-46.

The respondents filed an original petition for writ of prohibition in the California Court of Appeal, seeking to restrain further criminal proceedings against them. The parties asserted the same arguments as in the Superior Court proceeding. The Court of Appeal upheld the People's police power argument and affirmed the Superior Court decision; the police power is appropriate, the appellate court ruled, because the fish resource is predominantly produced in upstream waters and merely "passes through" the reservation area in migrating to and from the ocean, and also because most of the fish resource is produced in upstream hatcheries operated by the State. App. 39-40, 42-43. The appellate court did not reach or consider the People's main arguments, which were that California has sovereign trust title over the fish resource and that the reservation excludes the river. App. 43 n. 4.[4] The respondents sought and obtained review in the California Supreme Court.

---

[3] One of the defendants, Diane Sue Mattz, whose name appears in the caption of the decision below, died during the pendancy of the appeal, App. 1 n. 1, and is not listed as a respondent in this petition.

The California Supreme Court, in a divided opinion, reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal. App. 1. With respect to the People's main argument—that California has sovereign trust title over the resource, and that the reservation excludes the river—the Court acknowledged that, according to the executive order that created the reservation, California holds "title to the river bed of the Klamath River and its resources." App. 20. The Court held, however, that the executive order "reserve[d] Indian fishing rights" under the United States' general authority to "reserve water rights." App. 19-20. The Court stated that:

> "The People's fundamental assertion—that, after California's entry into the union, the federal government lost any right to reserve Indian fishing rights in the Klamath River through the establishment of an Indian reservation on federally owned land adjacent to the river—is quite similar to a claim which the United States Supreme Court expressly rejected 25 years ago in the case of Arizona v. California, supra, 373 U.S. 546. In that case, the State of Arizona challenged the right of the federal government to reserve water rights for Indians in the Colorado River through the creation of new Indian reservations in Arizona after Arizona had become a state. In rejecting the claim, the court explained: 'Arizona's contention that the Federal Government had no power, after Arizona became a State, to reserve waters for the use and benefit of federal reserved lands rests > largely upon statements in Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, . . . and Shively v. Bowlby. . . . Those cases and others that followed them gave rise to the doctrine that lands underlying navigable waters within territory acquired by the Government are held in trust for future States and that title to such lands is automatically vested in the States upon admission to the Union. But those cases involved only the shores of and lands beneath navigable waters. They do not determine the problem before us and cannot be accepted as limiting the broad powers of the United States to regulate navigable waters under the Commerce Clause and to regulate government lands under Art. IV, § 3, of the Constitution. We have no doubt about the power of the United States under these clauses to reserve water rights for its reservations and its property.' (373 U.S. at pp. 597-598 [emphasis added, fn. omitted]; see also United States v. New Mexico (1978) 438 U.S. 696, 698.) Although the reserved rights in Arizona v. California involved the Indians' use of water for irrigation purposes, the People have cited no authority which suggests that Indian fishing rights, which may be equally central to Indian survival and self-sufficiency, are any less eligible for federal reservation and protection." App. 19-20 (first emphasis in original; second emphasis added; citations omitted).

---

[4] The People's off-reservation sales argument had been rejected in the California Supreme Court's interim decision in People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at 534-536, and was not thereafter pursued in the case below.

Therefore, the Court held that, although California has sovereign trust "title" to the fish resource, the Indians possess "reserved" commercial fishing rights under federal law, and thus the State cannot regulate such rights.[5] [5] The California Supreme Court stated that it had previously ruled in People v. McCovey, supra, that the Indians "possess federally reserved fishing rights." App. 18. As noted above, however, McCovey simply assumed that the Indians have commercial fishing rights under federal law, and did not specifically consider whether the Indians possess "reserved" fishing rights that constrain California's sovereign trust authority. See note 2, supra.

---

The California Supreme Court rejected the People's police power argument by reaffirming its earlier holding in McCovey that the Secretary of the Interior's regulations preempt California law as applied to

ARGUMENT

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

This case raises the question, never decided by this Court, whether Indians possess "reserved" commercial fishing rights in a navigable river that the state holds in trust for all the people. The California Supreme Court held that an executive order, issued long after California's admission to statehood, "reserved" Indian commercial fishing rights, in the sense that the United States "reserves" unappropriated for use on reserved lands. In effect, the Court held that the reserved rights doctrine authorizes reservations of fishing rights—contrary to this Court's decisions restricting the doctrine to water rights—and allowed the United States to "reserve" rights in navigable waters that could not be directly granted during the post-statehood period. Moreover, the Court misconstrued the executive order, which specifically excluded the river from the reservation in recognition of California's sovereign interests in the river. The decision below diminishes California's sovereign trust authority over a valuable but fragile fish resource that California has traditionally regulated for all the people.

Indian commercial fishing. App. 10-16. The Secretary's regulations, although relevant to the police power issue, are not relevant to the reserved rights issue raised here, because, as noted earlier, the Secretary would lack authority to preempt California law if the Indians do not possess "reserved" fishing rights that constrain California's sovereign trust authority over the fish resource. See note 2, supra. Indeed, the California Supreme Court appeared to recognize that the Secretary's regulations are irrelevant to the reserved rights issue, because the Court rejected the People's argument that it has sovereign trust authority over the fish resource only by holding that the Indians possess "reserved" fishing rights, and did not suggest that the Secretary's regulations could override California's sovereign trust authority. App. 19-20.

The California Supreme Court left open the possibility that the People may have police power authority to regulate Indian commercial fishing if the California Legislature enacts another statutory scheme more closely tailored to specific conservation exigencies in the Klamath River. App. 15 n. 7. Since the Court reserved full consideration of the police power issue until the Legislature enacts another statutory scheme, the issue is not raised in this petition.

Under the equal footing doctrine, each state, upon admission to statehood, acquires sovereign title and dominion over all navigable waters and fish resources therein, subject only to the paramount federal power to regulate commerce and navigation. Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. 212, 229 (1845); McCready v. Virginia, 94 U.S. 391, 394-395 (1876). The state holds the waters and resources in trust for all the people. McCready, 94 U.S. at 394-395. California thus has the sovereign right to regulate the Klamath River fish resource for the benefit of all its citizens.

In Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U.S. 1, 48 (1894), this Court held that the United States holds absolute title and dominion over navigable waters and fish resources during the pre-statehood period, and therefore has the right to grant proprietary rights in the waters and resources during that period. Following Shively, this Court has held that the United States has the right to grant Indian fishing rights by treaties executed prior to the state's admission to statehood. United States v. Winans, 198 U.S. 371 (1905). The corollary of Shively and Winans is that the United States cannot grant proprietary rights in navigable waters—including Indian commercial fishing rights—by executive orders issued after the state's admission. The Indian reservation in this case was created by an executive order issued after California's admission to statehood. Therefore, the executive order could not have granted Indian commercial fishing rights, even assuming that it meant to do so.

The California Supreme Court held that, although California has sovereign trust "title" over the river and its fish resources, the executive order "reserved" Indian commercial fishing rights, in the sense that the United States "reserved" water rights in Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 597-601 (1963). App. 19-20. In effect, the Court construed an executive order as reserving Indian commercial fishing rights during the post-statehood period, even though, under Shively and Winans, such rights could not have been directly granted during that period. The decision below allows the United States to indirectly accomplish under its reserved rights authority what cannot be directly accomplished under its authority to grant proprietary rights.

In applying the reserved rights doctrine here, the California Supreme Court expanded the doctrine far beyond limits recognized by this Court. According to this Court, the reserved rights doctrine holds that the United States impliedly "reserves" unappropriated water for use on federal reserved lands, with a priority based on the date of the reservation. United States v. New Mexico, 438 U.S. 696, 698, 702 (1978). As this Court stated in New Mexico, the United States reserves unappropriated "water" for "use" on reserved "lands." 438 U.S. at 698. Thus, the reserved rights doctrine is a water rights doctrine only. The doctrine authorizes reservations of water rights for use on land, but does not authorize reservations of commercial fishing rights in water. The California Supreme Court impermissibly converted a water rights doctrine into a doctrine authorizing reservations of other kinds of rights.

This Court has carefully restricted the scope of the reserved rights doctrine in order to minimize federal intrusion on state sovereign trust interests under the equal footing doctrine. In New Mexico, this Court held that the reserved rights doctrine authorizes the reservation of water only for "primary" reservation purposes, not "secondary" purposes. 438 U.S. at 696. Therefore, even assuming that the reserved rights doctrine should be extended to the fishing context, the question remains whether commercial fishing is a "primary" or "secondary" reservation purpose. The California Supreme Court utterly failed to make this inquiry. In our view, commercial fishing is not a "primary" reservation purpose because the Indians did not traditionally fish for commercial purposes during the pre-reservation period. This Court should grant review to determine whether commercial fishing is a "primary" reservation purpose, a question not answered by the Court below.

More generally, this Court has applied the reserved rights doctrine only where a qualitative analysis of federal, state and tribal interests supports its application. The California Supreme Court failed to qualitatively analyze these interests in expanding the doctrine here, but instead uncritically assumed that the presidential act of creating the reservation necessarily reserved commercial fishing rights. See notes 2, 5, supra. This Court should grant review to provide the qualitative analysis of interests that is lacking in the decision below. We submit that a qualitative analysis does not support an expansion of the reserved rights doctrine to the commercial fishing context, particularly where, as here, California has regulated the fish resource for most of this century and the resource merely passes through the reservation area in migrating to and from the ocean.

The United States itself has agreed with California's position that the Indians in this case do not have "reserved" fishing rights under federal law. In 1940, the Solicitor of the U. S. Department of the Interior issued an opinion declaring that, since California was admitted to statehood prior to the creation of the Indian reservation in this case, California has the right to regulate Indian fishing in the Klamath River if the river was navigable at the time of California's admission. See pages 14-15, infra. The Solicitor's opinion is consistent with this Court's decisions in Shively and Winans, which hold that the United States cannot grant proprietary rights in navigable waters during the post-statehood period. Although administrative interpretations of statutes and regulations are entitled to "great weight," e.g., Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475, 488-490 (1973), the California Supreme Court decision below accords the Solicitor's opinion no deference at all, and indeed does not even mention the opinion.

Additionally, the executive order creating the Indian reservation in this case supports California's position that the Indians do not have "reserved" fishing rights under federal law. The executive order, on its face, excluded the river from the reservation; the purpose of the exclusion, according to historical documents, was to preserve California's sovereign trust authority to regulate the fish resource for the benefit of all its citizens. See pages 19-22, infra. Thus, the executive order, rather than preempting California law by reserving commercial fishing rights, specifically recognized California's sovereign trust interests by not reserving such rights. The executive order is consistent with this Court's decisions in Shively and Winans and the Interior Solicitor's 1940 opinion, all of which make clear that the United States cannot convey proprietary rights in resources in navigable waters during the post-statehood period.

If, as the California Supreme Court held, the reserved rights doctrine applies to fish resources in navigable waters, the United States potentially would be able to reserve rights in other resources in navigable waters—such as mineral resources—that the states have traditionally held in trust for all their citizens. Thus, the decision below provides a doctrinal basis for an unprecedented expansion of federal control over resources other than the specific resource involved here. The decision has a potentially sweeping and devastating effect on state proprietary interests that transcends the immediate controversy.

In summary, the decision below allows Indians on a post-statehood executive order reservation to exercise exclusive commercial rights in a fish resource that California holds in trust for all its citizens. The decision reached this result by expanding the reserved rights doctrine—which this Court has always viewed as a water rights doctrine only—to the commercial fishing context. This Court should grant review to determine whether the reserved rights doctrine should be so expanded, and, if so, whether the executive order creating the reservation in this case can properly be construed as "reserving" such rights.

I

THE 1891 EXECUTIVE ORDER CREATING THE KLAMATH RIVER INDIAN RESERVATION COULD NOT AND DID NOT CONVEY INDIAN COMMERCIAL FISHING RIGHTS, AND THE CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT IGNORED THIS COURT'S PRECEDENTS IN RULING OTHERWISE

Under the equal footing doctrine, each state acquires, upon admission into the Union, sovereign "dominion and property in navigable waters, and in the lands under them," to be held in trust "for the benefit and advantage of the whole community." Martin v. Waddell, 41 U.S. 367, 410 (1841); see Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, supra, 44 U.S. at 229; Shively v. Bowlby, supra, 152 U.S. at 49-50; United States v. Oregon, 295 U.S. 1, 14 (1935). The states' sovereign interests include the right to regulate fish resources in navigable waters for the benefit of the whole community. McCready v. Virginia, supra, 94 U.S. at 394-395; Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U.S. 240, 259-262 (1891); Shively, 152 U.S. at 11. As this Court stated in McCready:

> "The principle has long been settled in this court, that each State owns the beds of all tide-waters within its jurisdiction, unless they have been granted away. [Citations omitted.] In like manner, the States own the tide-waters themselves, and the fish in them, so long as they are capable of ownership while running. . . . The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which . . . has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the State, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tide-waters and their beds to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish. . . . The right which the people of the State thus acquire . . . is, in fact, a property right, and not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship." 94 U.S. at 395 (emphasis added).

Therefore, when California was admitted to statehood, it acquired sovereign interests in the Klamath River and its fish resource that are held in trust for the whole community.

This Court has held that the United States has the right to grant proprietary rights in navigable waters prior to the state's admission to statehood. Shively, 152 U.S. at 48; United States v. Holt State Bank, 270 U.S. 49, 54-55 (1926); Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544, 551-552 (1981); Choctaw Nation v. Oklahoma, 397 U.S. 620 (1970). The United States, having "entire dominion and sovereignty" over the waters during the territorial period, has the right to convey proprietary rights during that period, although such rights are not unlimited. Shively, 152 at 48.[6] Following Shively, this Court has held that the United

---

[6] This Court in Shively stated that:

> "By the Constitution, as is now well settled, the United States, having rightfully acquired the Territories, and being the only government which can impose laws upon them, have the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and States has the right to grant Indian fishing rights by a treaty executed prior to the state's admission to the Union. United States v. Winans, supra, 198 U.S. at 371. In Winans, this Court stated that:

> "It is further contended that the rights conferred upon the Indians are subordinate to the powers acquired by the State upon its admission into the Union. . . . [¶] 'By the Constitution, as is now well settled, the United States, having rightfully acquired the Territories, and being the only Government which can impose laws upon them, have the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and State, over all the Territories, so long as they remain in territorial condition.' " 198 U.S. at 382-383, quoting from Shively, 152 U.S. at 48 (emphasis added).

Thus, under Winans, the United States has the right to grant Indian fishing rights by treaties executed during the pre-statehood period, before the state acquires its sovereign interests in navigable waters. Indeed, this Court in other cases has upheld Indian fishing rights granted by pre-statehood treaties. Department of Game v. Puyallup Tribe, 391 U.S. 392 (1968); Washington v. Washington State Commercial Ass'n, 443 U.S. 658 (1979); Metlakatla Indians v. Egan, 369 U.S. 45 (1962). Although these decisions did not specifically cite or rely on Winans, they are consistent with Winans' holding that the United States has the right to grant Indian fishing rights by treaties during the pre-statehood period.

There are no treaties between the United States and California's Indian tribes. Indians of California v. United States, 98 > state, over all the Territories, so long as they remain in territorial condition. [Citations omitted.] [¶] We cannot doubt, therefore, that Congress has the power to make grants of lands below high water mark of navigable waters in any Territory of the United States, whenever it becomes necessary to do so in order to perform international obligations, or to effect the improvement of such lands for the promotion and convenience of commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, or to carry out other public purposes appropriate to the objects for which the United States holds the Territory." 152 U.S. at 48 (emphasis added).

Ct.Cl. 583, 585 (1943). Moreover, the Indian reservation in this case was created by executive order after California's admission to statehood. California was admitted to statehood in 1850, 9 Stat. 452, and the executive order was issued in 1891, 1 Kappler 815. Therefore, California acquired its sovereign interests in the Klamath River fish resource prior to creation of the Indian reservation. Hence, under Shively and Winans, the executive order could not have granted Indian commercial fishing rights in derogation of California's sovereign trust authority, even assuming that it meant to do so.

The United States itself has adopted the same view. In 1940, the Solicitor of the U.S. Department of the Interior issued an opinion declaring that, since California was admitted to statehood prior to issuance of the 1891 executive order creating the Indian reservation in this case, California has the right to regulate Indian fishing in the Klamath River if the river was navigable at the time of California's admission. I Ops. Solicitor, U.S. Dept. of Interior, 1917-1974, at 945-948 (March 13, 1940). The Solicitor distinguished his earlier opinion declaring that the Indians of the Red Lake Indian Reservation in Minnesota are not subject to state fishing laws, stating that the Minnesota reservation was created prior to Minnesota's admission to statehood. Id. Referring to the Klamath River situation, the Solicitor declared that:

> "I find nothing in the history of the setting apart of the territory here in question to indicate that the Indians possessed any rights to the lands or water prior to the establishment of the reservations. . . . . [¶] Since the Indians in question derive any rights they may have in the river from the United States, the question to be considered is what title, if any, did the United States retain to itself in the bed of the particular portions of the river involved when the State of California was admitted into the Union. . . . [¶] Title to that portion of the bed of the Klamath River here in question passed to the State if the river at the points in question were navigable in 1850 . . . (see United States v. Utah, 283 U.S. 64, 75)." Id. at 945-946 (emphasis added).

Thus, under the Solicitor's opinion, California has the right to regulate Indian fishing if the Klamath River was navigable when California was admitted to statehood in 1850.[7] The California Supreme Court decision is inconsistent with the Solicitor's opinion, and indeed does not even mention the opinion.

In summary, the United States could not and did not convey Indian commercial fishing rights in the Klamath River subsequent to California's admission to statehood in 1850, because California acquired sovereign interests in the fish resource that are held in trust for all the people of California.

II

THE CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT IMPROPERLY EXPANDED THE RESERVED RIGHTS DOCTRINE TO THE COMMERCIAL FISHING CONTEXT

The California Supreme Court held that the executive order creating the Indian reservation "reserved" Indian commercial fishing rights, in the same sense that the United States "reserved" water rights in Arizona v. California, supra, 373 U.S. at 597-598. App. 19-22. Under the reserved rights doctrine, Congress impliedly reserves unappropriated water for use on appurtenant federal reserved lands, with a priority based on the date of the reservation. United States v. New Mexico, supra, 438 U.S. at 698-702; Cappaert v. United States, , 426 U.S. 128, 138-142 (1976); Arizona v. California, supra, 373 U.S. at 597-601; Winters v. United States, 207 U.S. 564, 577 (1908). In effect, the California Supreme Court decision allows the United States—by "reserving" commercial fishing rights—to effectively grant proprietary rights in fish resources after a state's admission to statehood,

---

[7] The Klamath River is a navigable river under California law. Cal. Harbor & Nav. Code § 103; People v. Ward Redwood Co., 225 Cal.App.2d 385, 387 (1964). Under federal law, the navigability of the Klamath River is evidenced by the fact that the federal public land surveyor meandered the river and approved federal township plats depicting the extent of public lands that did not include the river as public lands. See e.g., Instructions to the Surveyors General of Public Lands (1855) (requiring U.S. Deputy Surveyors to meander navigable streams); United States v. Utah, 420 U.S. 304 (1975); Harrison v. Fite, 148 Fed. 781, 783 (8th Cir. 1906).

contrary to this Court's decisions in Shively and Winans and the Interior Solicitor's 1940 opinion, all of which preclude the United States from granting such rights during the post-statehood period. The decision below allows the United States to indirectly achieve under its reserved rights authority what cannot be directly achieved under its authority to grant rights. This Court should grant review to make clear that the United States cannot improperly "grant" rights during the post-statehood period by "reserving" them.

The California Supreme Court, in expanding the reserved rights doctrine to the commercial fishing context, disregarded this Court's decisions restricting the scope of the doctrine. This Court has consistently held that the doctrine authorizes reservations only of unappropriated water for use on reserved lands. As this Court stated in New Mexico:

> "This Court has previously concluded that whatever powers the States acquired over their waters as a result of congressional Acts and admission into the Union, . . . Congress did not intend thereby to relinquish its authority to reserve unappropriated water in the future for use on appurtenant lands withdrawn from the public domain for specific federal purposes." 438 U.S. at 698 (emphasis added).

Moreover, this Court has consistently applied the reserved rights doctrine only in a water rights context, and has never held or suggested that the doctrine applies in other contexts.[8] Therefore, the doctrine is a water rights doctrine only. The doctrine autho-

---

[8] In Winters, 207 U.S. at 576-577, this Court held that the United States impliedly reserved unappropriated water for irrigation use on an Indian reservation in Montana. In Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. at 597-601, this Court held that the United States impliedly reserved unappropriated water for irrigation use on Indian reservations in Arizona and California, and that the reserved right was measured by the "practicably irrigable acreage" of the reservation. In Cappaert, 426 U.S. at 138-143, this Court held that the United States impliedly reserved unappropriated water for use on federal lands set aside as a national monument in Nevada, with a priority based on the date of the reservation. In New Mexico, 438 U.S. at 702, this Court held that the United rizes reservations of water rights for use on land, but does not authorize reservations of commercial fishing rights in water. The California Supreme Court decision impermissibly expands the doctrine beyond its proper scope.

To support its expansion of the doctrine, the California Supreme Court cited this Court's decision in Arizona v. California, supra, 373 U.S. at 597-601, which held that the United States impliedly reserved water rights for irrigation uses on Indian reservations in Arizona and California. App. 20. Since Arizona involved a reservation of water rights, Arizona does not support an expansion of the doctrine to the commercial fishing context. In addition, the historic purpose of the reserved rights doctrine, as applied to Indian reservations, was to allow Indians to acquire water rights for development of their land. See Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. at 597-601; Winters, 207 U.S. at 576, 577; Board of Commissioners v. Seber, 318 U.S. 705, 715 (1943). This historic reservation policy is not consistent with reservations of commercial rights in fish resources that the states have always held in trust for the whole community.

III

THE CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT FAILED TO DETERMINE WHETHER INDIAN COMMERCIAL FISHING IS A "PRIMARY" OR "SECONDARY" RESERVATION PURPOSE, OR OTHERWISE TO QUALITATIVELY ANALYZE FEDERAL, STATE AND TRIBAL INTERESTS

This Court has carefully restricted the scope of the reserved rights doctrine in order to minimize federal intrusion on the states' sovereign trust interests in navigable waters, and has applied the doctrine only where discrete federal interests have outweighed the states' sovereign trust interests. In New Mexico, this Court held that the reserved rights doctrine authorizes the reservation of water only for "primary" reservation uses, and that the United States must acquire water rights for "secondary" reservation uses under state law. 438 U.S. at 696. Therefore, even as applied to water rights, the doctrine does not authorize the reservation of all water necessary to serve all needs of federal reserved lands. Rather, under New Mexico, the federal interest—in terms of whether "primary" or "secondary" reservation uses are involved—must be measured against the states' sovereign interests in regulating their water resources. The Court below, applying Arizona v. California by analogy but ignoring New Mexico altogether, failed to consider whether Indian commercial fishing is a "primary" or "secondary" reservation purpose. Therefore, even assuming that the reserved rights doctrine otherwise applies here, the decision below is inconsistent with this Court's analysis in New Mexico. This Court should grant review to determine whether commercial fishing is a "primary" reservation purpose, assuming that the reserved rights doctrine otherwise applies here. We submit that commercial fishing is not a "primary" reservation purpose because the Indians did not traditionally fish for commercial purposes during the pre-reservation period.

States impliedly reserved unappropriated water for "primary" uses but not "secondary" uses on national forest lands in New Mexico.

This Court has circumscribed the reserved rights doctrine in other respects in order to minimize federal intrusion on sovereign state trust interests. In Cappaert v. United States, supra, 426 U.S. at 141, this Court stated that the reserved rights doctrine authorizes the reservation only of the "amount of water" necessary to satisfy the "minimal need" of the reservation, "no more." This restriction, coupled with New Mexico's distinction between "primary" and "secondary" reservation uses, reflects an accommodation of federal reserved rights authority and state equal footing authority. In light of this accommodation, it cannot be assumed that— simply because the United States reserves lands for Indian purposes—the United States necessarily reserves Indian commercial fishing rights. Rather, the tribal interest in fishing for commercial purposes must be measured against the states' interests in regulating their fish resources for the public. The decision below failed to qualitatively analyze these interests in extending the reserved rights doctrine to the commercial fishing context, and instead simply assumed that the presidential act of reserving land for Indian purposes necessarily reserved commercial fishing rights as well. See note 5, supra.

In our view, California's interest in conserving the Klamath River fish resource strongly outweighs any tribal interest in exploiting the resource for commercial gain. California has regulated the fish resource for most of this century. The resource is predominantly produced in waters upstream from the reservation area, and merely passes through the reservation area in migrating to and from the ocean. Therefore, the resource's contact with the reservation area is limited and episodic. Most of the fish resource is produced in upstream hatcheries operated by the State. These factors, we believe, weigh heavily against an expansion of the reserved rights doctrine to the commercial fishing context here. This Court should grant review to determinate whether a qualitative analysis of competing interests supports an expansion of the reserved rights doctrine to the commercial fishing context. We submit that it does not.

IV

THE PRESIDENTIAL EXECUTIVE ORDER CREATING THE INDIAN RESERVATION SPECIFICALLY EXCLUDED THE RIVER FROM THE RESERVATION IN RECOGNITION OF CALIFORNIA'S SOVEREIGN INTERESTS IN THE RIVER AND ITS FISH RESOURCE, AND THEREFORE DID NOT RESERVE INDIAN COMMERCIAL FISHING RIGHTS

The 1891 executive order creating the Indian reservation in this case provided that the reservation included only a "tract of country one mile in width on each side of the Klamath River . . ." 1 Kappler 815 (emphasis added). Thus, the executive order provided on its face that the reservation includes only the lands appurtenant to the river, but not the river itself.

The surrounding historical circumstances reveal that the executive order excluded the river from the reservation in recognition of California's sovereign interests in the river and its fish resource. In 1891, the Secretary of the Interior proposed to extend an upstream Indian reservation to the mouth of the Klamath River in order to provide a homeland for the Yurok Tribe. The Secretary asked the U. S. Attorney General for an opinion concerning the legality of the extension. In reply, the U. S. Attorney General issued an opinion in 1891 declaring that, although the upstream reservation could be lawfully extended, the extension could not include the river itself because California acquired a sovereign interest in the river and its fish resource upon its admission to statehood in 1850. Letter from Assistant U. S. Attorney General to Secretary of the Interior, January 20, 1891 (hereinafter "1891 Att. Gen. Op.").

The Attorney General's 1891 opinion cited an earlier 1887 Attorney General opinion on the same question, which had stated that:

> "The Klamath River being a navigable stream the public have the right to fish there and use it in any way that does not amount to an interruption or interference with interstate or foreign commerce or navigation, or a violation of some law of the State of California. [¶] In the case of McCready v. Virginia (94 U.S., 391, 394) the Supreme Court says: . . . 'In like manner the States own the tide-waters themselves and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running. For this purpose the State represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty. (Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet., 410) The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the State, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tidewaters and their beds, to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish, so far as it may be done without obstructing navigation." S. Exec. Doc. No. 140, at 13-14, 50th Cong., 2d Sess. (1887), cited in 1891 Atty. Gen. Op. 25 (emphasis added).

The Attorney General's 1891 opinion concluded that:

> "Inasmuch as the Klamath River is not within the Indian country nor the Indian reservation of 'one mile in width on each side' thereof, there was and could be no question . . . as > to the legal or actual status of that reservation." 1891 Atty. Gen. Op. 26.[9]

Thus, the Attorney General opinion declared that the proposed extension could not include the river because California acquired sovereign title to the river and its fish resource upon admission into the Union. The Attorney General opinion is consistent with this Court's decisions in Shively and Winans and the Interior Solicitor's 1940 opinion, all of which make clear that the United States cannot grant or reserve Indian fishing rights during the post-statehood period.

The Secretary of the Interior transmitted both the proposed executive order and the Attorney General's 1891 opinion to the President, explaining that the Attorney General opinion explained the "reason for the issuance of the order in the premises." Letter from Secretary of the Interior to President Benjamin Harrison, Oct. 12, 1981. The President signed the executive order as proposed. The executive order provided—consistently with the recommendation in the Attorney General opinion—that the reservation includes only a "tract of country one mile in width on each side of" the Klamath River. 1 Kappler 815. Since the President relied on the Attorney General opinion in signing the executive order, and since the executive order contained the language recommended in the Attorney General opinion, the Attorney General opinion is highly relevant in construing the executive order itself.

In short, the executive order, both on its face and in light of surrounding historical circumstances, excludes the river from the reservation in recognition of California's sovereign right to regulate the fish resource for the benefit of the whole community. The executive order, rather than "reserving" Indian fishing rights, specifically recognized California's sovereign right to regulate the resource for the public. The California Supreme Court below misconstrued the purpose and effect of the executive order. As this Court commented in another Indian law case, the judicial "task [in construing federal Indian laws] . . . is a narrow one," for the judiciary "cannot remake history." DeCoteau v. District County Court, 420 U.S. 425, 449 (1975).

---

[9] In the proceedings below, the Superior Court, at the People's request, granted judicial notice of the U.S. Attorney General's 1887 and 1891 opinions. App. 45. Although the People requested the California Supreme Court to grant judicial notice of these opinions, the Supreme Court did not specifically grant judicial notice, App. 18, but nonetheless considered the opinions on their merits. App. 20-21.

The California Supreme Court acknowledged that the historical circumstances indicate that California, "upon entry into the union, acquired title to the river bed of the Klamath River and its resources." App. 20 (emphasis added). The Court stated, however, that these historical circumstances do not indicate that the 1891 executive order did not mean to "reserve" Indian commercial fishing rights, particularly because the Indians had traditionally fished in the area. Id. The Court's analysis appears contradictory. If, as the Court acknowledged, the executive order recognized California's "title" to the fish "resources," the executive order manifestly did not authorize Indians to commercially harvest the resource in violation of California law. It is contradictory to hold that California has "title" to the resource but cannot prohibit its commercial exploitation.[10]

---

[10] The California Supreme Court also stated that its decision was supported by Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 213 (1913). App. 21, & n. 9. In Donnelly, this Court upheld the jurisdiction of a federal court over a criminal prosecution involving a murder that had occurred within the bed of the Klamath River. This Court reasoned that the murder was committed within an Indian reservation because the United States had "title" to the river bed.

On rehearing, however, this Court specifically withdrew that portion of the opinion holding that the United States had "title" to the river bed, which was the premise for the Court's conclusion that the river bed was included within the reservation. 228 U.S. at 708. Therefore, contrary to the California Supreme Court's view, this Court has never held that the reservation includes the river bed. Moreover, if the California Supreme Court meant to cite Donnelly for the view that the United States has title to the river bed, the instant decision is internally inconsistent, for the decision also holds that the historical circumstances indicate that California has "title to the river bed of the Klamath River and its resources." App. 20.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, it is respectfully requested that this Court grant the petition for writ of certiorari.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN K. VAN DE KAMP
Attorney General for the
State of California

R. H. CONNETT
Assistant Attorney General

RODERICK E. WALSTON
CHARLES W. GETZ IV
BRUCE S. FLUSHMAN
MARY E. HACKENBRACHT
Deputy Attorneys General

Attorneys for Petitioner
People of the State of California

Appendix A

IN THE SUPREME COURT
OF THE
STATE OF CALIFORNIA

S002805
(Ct. of Appeal A024108)

Diane Sue Mattz et al.,
Petitioners,

v.

The Superior Court of Del Norte County,
Respondent;

The People,
Real Party in Interest.

[Filed Aug. 22, 1988]

In 1981, the People filed criminal charges against Diane Sue Mattz, Antone Folkins and Kenneth Mattz (hereafter defendants)—three Yurok Indians of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation in Northern California—arising out of defendants' alleged commercial fishing activities in the Klamath River on the reservation.[1] Before trial, defendants challenged the state's authority to pursue the prosecutions, and in 1984, while this writ proceeding was pending inthe Court of Appeal, we held in People v. McCovey (1984) 36 Cal.3d 517 that the comprehensive federal regulation of Indian fishing rights on the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation preempts the state from criminally prosecuting Yurok Indians for such activity. Although acknowledging the similarity between the present proceeding and McCovey, the Court of Appeal found that McCovey was not controlling for a number of reasons and held that the underlying criminal prosecutions could go forward. We granted review to consider the validity

---

[1] Diane Sue Mattz died during the pendency of this proceeding. Because the title of the proceeding below bears her name, we have retained the title for consistency. (See Cal. Style Manual (3d ed. 1986) § 211, p. 145.)

(SEE CONCURRING AND DISSENTING OPINIONS) of the Court of Appeal's interpretation and application of McCovey and now reverse the Court of Appeal judgment.

I

In September 1981, defendants were charged with violating and conspiring to violate criminal provisions of the California Fish and Game Code which prohibit (1) the sale of fish taken in the Klamath River District, and (2) the sale, or possession for sale, of any salmon, steelhead or striped bass, taken in California waters by means of a gill net. (Fish & G. Code, §§ 8434, 8685.6; Pen. Code, § 182.) The evidence presented at the preliminary hearing established that defendants are Yurok Indians of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation and that the charged offenses involved fish caught within the boundaries of the reservation. On the basis of that evidence, the magistrate dismissed the charges, concluding that the state lacked jurisdiction to prosecute defendants for such fishing activities in reservation waters.

The People then moved in superior court to reinstate the charges. The superior court, relying in large part on the fact that the federal regulations in effect at the time of the alleged offenses barred commercial fishing by Indians in the Klamath River, found that state prosecutions for such conduct were not preempted and reinstated the charges. Defendants' subsequent motion to dismiss was denied by the superior court in August 1983.

In September 1983, defendants filed the present writ proceeding in the Court of Appeal, maintaining, inter alia, that California lacks jurisdiction to prosecute Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation under state law for offenses arising from on-reservation fishing. As noted, at the time the writ petition was filed, a case presenting a similar legal issue—People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d 517—was pending before our court. Recognizing that the decision in McCovey might well be dispositive of this mater, defendants, at the People's request, waived their rights to a speedy trial "to a date ninety (90) days after the filing of the remittitur" in McCovey, and the Court of Appeal held this matter in abeyance pending our McCovey decision.

We handed down our decision in McCovey in July 1984, concluding generally that the comprehensive federal regulation of Indian fishing rights on the Hoopa Valley Reservation preempted state criminal prosecutions both of Indian fishing activities on the reservation and of the off-reservation sale by reservation Indians of fish that had been caught on the reservation. The People sought certiorari in the United States Supreme Court, but that court denied the petition for certiorari in November 1984. (California v. McCovey (1984) 469 U.S. 1062.)

A few weeks thereafter, the People filed an opposition brief in the present writ proceeding in the Court of Appeal, contending that the McCovey decision was not dispositive of this proceeding and arguing—on the basis of historical documents of which it urged the court to take judicial notice—that the Yurok Indians possess no federally protected fishing rights in the Klamath River and that the federal government lacked the constitutional authority to adopt the regulations which McCovey had found preempted state criminal prosecutions. Ten months later, in October 1985, after the People had filed several additional letter briefs, defendants filed a notice of abandonment of the writ proceeding in the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal initially summarily dismissed the proceeding pursuant to the abandonment, but when the People informed the appellate court that it had not received notice of the proposed abandonment and urged the court to vacate the dismissal, the Court of Appeal vacated the dismissal order and reinstated the proceeding.

In October 1987, the Court of Appeal rendered its decision in this matter. Although the Court of Appeal recognized that the McCovey decision "would at first blush appear to entitle [defendants] to a writ of prohibition restraining further prosecution on the state criminal charges," the court went on to conclude that McCovey did not require it to issue such a writ. The Court of Appeal did not, however, embrace the People's assertion that the federal government lacked the constitutional authority to promulgate regulations governing Indian fishing rights on the Hoopa Valley Reservation, but instead held that the state's interest in conservation justifies concurrent state and federal regulatory jurisdiction over commercial Klamath River fishing and that McCovey did not preclude the state from exercising such jurisdiction even with respect to on-reservation fishing activities by Yurok Indians. Accordingly, it denied the writ petition, permitting the underlying criminal prosecutions against defendants to go forward.

We granted review to determine the validity of the Court of Appeal's interpretation and application of McCovey.

II

As a threshold matter, defendants contend that the Court of Appeal lacked jurisdiction to render its decision on the merits of this writ proceeding. On October 7, 1985, after the matter had been fully briefed in the Court of Appeal, defendants, who had instituted this writ proceeding, filed a "notice of abandonment" of the writ petition with the Court of Appeal (see Cal. Rules of Court, rules 19, 38, 53), requesting that the court "order the dismissal of the writ and the issuance of their remittitur." Defendants evidently did not serve the People with a copy of the notice of abandonment and the clerk of the court also apparently failed to immediately notify the People of the filing of the notice. (See Cal. Rules of Court, rules 19(c), 38.) On October 15, 1985, the Court of Appeal, having received no opposition from the People, summarily dismissed the petition pursuant to the abandonment.

The People received notice of the dismissal on October 16, 1985, and immediately filed a motion requesting the Court of Appeal to vacate its order of dismissal. In their motion, the People pointed out that they had not received notice of the proposed abandonment, and urged the court to vacate the dismissal and retain the case in light of the important public question presented by the proceeding. (See, e.g., Lucchesi v. City of San Jose (1980) 104 Cal.App.3d 323, 326 fn. 2.)[2] On October 25,

---

[2] In urging the Court of Appeal to retain the case, the People argued that the federal government's ability to effectively regulate Indian fishing had been seriously impaired by the then-recent federal district court decision in United States v. Wilson (N.D. Cal. 1985) 611 F.Supp. 813, in which the court had invalidated a federal regulation prohibiting all on-reservation commercial fishing by Yurok Indians on the ground that the federal agency which had promulgated the regulation had not 1985, the Court of Appeal issued an order vacating its initial dismissal order and reinstating the writ proceeding. Defendants did not challenge the validity of the order vacating dismissal at that point, and the Court of Appeal went on to decide the writ petition on the merits.

Defendants now contend that the Court of Appeal lacked jurisdiction to decide the matter. Although defendants acknowledge that under rules 19(b) and 38 of the California Rules of Court the Court of Appeal had discretion to decline to accede to their proposed abandonment of the writ proceeding (see generally 9 Witkin, Cal.Procedure (3d ed. 1985) Appeal, § 505, p. 491; Cal. Civil Appellate Practice (Cont.Ed.Bar 1985) § 10.15, pp. 287-288), they contend that once the Court of Appeal ordered dismissal it lacked jurisdiction to reinstate the proceeding. Past cases have held, however, that under appropriate circumstances a Court of Appeal may vacate an order of dismissal and reinstate an appeal (see, e.g., Lundy v. Lakin (1949) 89 Cal.App.2d 849; Krug v. Meehan (1951) 108 Cal.App.2d 416; see generally 9 Witkin, Cal.Procedure (3d ed. 1985) Appeal, § 514, pp. 497-498), and at least under the circumstances of this case—in which the Court of Appeal, in ordering dismissal, was apparently unaware that the clerk of the court had failed to immediately notify the People of the proposed abandonment as required by rules 19(c) and 38—we conclude that the Court of Appeal had similar authority to vacate its dismissal of the writ proceeding. Indeed, in view of the fact that defendants voiced no objection to the Court of Appeal's reinstatement of the proceeding at a time when the People could still have sought review of the initial dismissal in this court, it clearly would be inequitable to permit defendants to challenge the Court of Appeal's decision on such a basis at this late date.

---

demonstrated a sufficient justification to warrant that degree of interfernce with Indian fishing rights.

In United States v. Eberhardt (9th Cir. 1986) 789 F.2d 1354, the Ninth Circuit reversed the Wilson decision, holding that the district court had applied an improperly restrictive legal standard in concluding that the Interior Department had exceeded its statutory authority in issuing the fishing regulations for the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation.

Accordingly, we turn to the merits of the Court of Appeal decision.

III

The principal issue is whether the Court of Appeal properly declined to follow this court's recent decision in McCovey. Some background on the geography and history of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation may be a helpful preface to a summary of the McCovey decision.

A.

As explained in McCovey, the present Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation is, geographically, made up of three contiguous sections: "(1) the Old Klamath River Reservation, a 2-mile wide strip of land, 1 mile in width on each side of the Klamath River, which extends 20 miles inland from the mouth of the river on the Pacific Ocean; (2) the original Hoopa Valley Reservation, a 12-mile square area, containing approximately 89,000 acres, which lies on both sides of the Trinity River; and (3) a 30-mile strip along the Klamath River which connects (1) and (2)." McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at pp. 523-524.) (A map of the reservation is set forth as an appendix to McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 538.)

The history of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservaton has been recounted in detail in two United States Supreme Court, and numerous lower court, decisions over the past seventy-five years and there is no need to extensively review that history here. (See, e.g., Donnelly v. United States (1913) 228 U.S. 243; Mattz v. Arnett (1973) 412 U.S. 481; United States v. Eberhardt (9th Cir. 1986) 789 F.2d 1354; Blake v. Arnett (9th Cir. 1981) 663 F.2d 906; Elser v. Gill Net Number One (1966) 246 Cal.App.2d 30; Arnett v. Five Gill Nets (1975) 48 Cal.App.3d 454; Donahue v. Justice Court (1971) 15 Cal.App.3d 357.) For our purposes, a brief summary should suffice.

In 1853, Congress enacted legislation authorizing the President "to make . . . reservations . . . in the State of California . . . for Indian purposes." (10 Stat. 238 (Mar. 3, 1853).) Two years later, the President established the Klamath River Reservation by executive order. (See Mattz v. Arnett, supra, 412 U.S. 481, 487.) In 1864, Congress passed legislation authorizing the President to set apart no more than four tracts of land in California "for the purposes of Indian Reservations," and in 1876, the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation—a reservaton geographically separate from the Klamath River Reservation—was formally set aside for Indian purposes pursuant to the 1864 act. (Id. at pp. 493-494.)

In 1891, the original Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation "was entended [by executive order] so as to include all land, one mile in width on each side of the [Klamath] [R]iver, from 'the present limits' of the [original] Hoopa Valley Reservation to the Pacific Ocean. The Klamath River Reservation, or what had been the reservation, thus was made part of the Hoopa Valley Reservation, as extended." (Mattz v. Arnett, supra, 412 U.S. 481, 493.)

In 1913, the question of the validity of the 1891 extension of the Hoopa Valley Reservation came before the United States Supreme Court in Donnelly v. United States, supra, 228 U.S. 243. In that case, the defendant had been tried and convicted in federal court for killing a member of the Yurok (or, as it was also known, Klamath) Indian tribe "while he was in or near the edge of the water of the Klamath River, at a place within the exterior limits of the Extension" (228 U.S. at p. 252), and the defendant contended, inter alia, that the federal government had no jurisdiction over the case because the executive order extending the Hoopa Valley Reservation to include the area of the Klamath River Rreservation was invalid and thus the crime had not been committed within the boundaries of a federal Indian reservation. The Donnelly court rejected the contention and affirmed the conviction.

Despite the Donnelly decision, supra, 228 U.S. 243, over the ensuing decades questions continued to be raised as to whether the Hoopa Valley Reservation Extension—the old Klamath River Reservation—remained in existence or whether that portion of the reservation had been terminated by an 1892 federal act permitting allotment of unoccupied land in that area to non-Indian settlers. (See, e.g., Elser v. Gill Net Number One (1966) 246 Cal.App.2d 30, 34.) In Mattz v. Arnett, supra, 412 U.S. 481, that question arose in the context of an action brought by the California Department of Fish and Game, seeking a court order authorizing the sale or destruction of five gill nets—belonging to Raymond Mattz, a Yurok Indian—which had been seized by a California game warden. In the initial state court proceeding, the California courts concluded that in light of the 1892 federal act the Klamath River Reservation was not Indian territory and that the gill nets were therefore subject to seizure pursuant to state law. (Arnett v. Five Gill Nets (1971) 20 Cal.App.3d 729.) The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari and reversed, concluding "that the Klamath Indian Reservation was not terminated by the [1892 legislation] and that the land within the boundaries of the reservation is still Indian country. . . ." (Mattz v. Arnett, supra, 412 U.S. at p. 506.)

In the proceedings on remand of the Mattz v. Arnett decision, the trial court held that, in view of the United States Supreme Court's conclusion as to the status of the Hoopa Valley Reservation Extension, the state had no authority to regulate subsistence fishing by Indians on the Klamath River Reservation because federal law exempted Indian fishing rights on reservations from state regulation. The state appealed that ruling, but in Arnett v. Five Gill Nets (1975) 48 Cal.App.3d 454 [hereafter Five Gill Nets], the Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's decision, rejecting the states arguments (1) that federal law did not protect the Indians' traditional on-reservation fishing rights from state regulation, and (2) that the state's interest in conservation of salmon was sufficient to justify the regulation at issue in that case. The United States Supreme Court denied the state's petition for certiorari. (Arnett v. Five Gill Nets (1976) 425 U.S. 907)

In 1977, two years after the Five Gill Nets decision, supra, 48 Cal.App.3d 454, had established that Indians exercising traditional fishing rights in the Klamath River were exempt from state regulation, the United States Department of the Interior—the federal agency charged with the duty of overseeing Indian affairs —promulgated extensive regulations governing Klamath River fishing by Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation. (42 Fed.Reg.

40904-40905 (Aug. 12, 1977).)[3] The purpose of the regulations, as set forth in the regulations themselves, "is to protect the fishery resources and to establish procedures for the exercise of the fishing rights of Indians of the Reservation until a Reservation-wide management mechanism is established with the capability to manage and regulate the Indian fisheries on the Reservation. The regulations are intended to promote reasonably equal access to the fishery resources of the Reservation by all Indians of the Reservation, and to assure adequate spawning escapement." (25 C.F.R. § 250.1(a) (1988).)

As we noted in McCovey, the federal regulations are quite detailed and comprehensive. They specify the types and sizes of nets that may be used, the locations where the nets may be placed, and the particular days and hours when gill nets may be utilized; they reguire fish caught on the reservation to be marked in a particular manner and limit the number of fish Indians may transport off the reservation without a special permit. To facilitate the enforcement of the regulations, all eligible Indians are required to obtain and possess a fisher's identification card before exercising any fishing rights on the reservation. The regulations also establish the applicable punishments that may be imposed for violation of the regulations and establish procedures for the prosecution of such violations.

In addition, the regulations authorize local federal officials to promulgate in-season and emergency regulations when necessary to ensure the proper management of the reservation fisheries, to meet conservation needs and to protect spawning escapement. In order to promote conservation, for much of the period between the initial promulgation of the regulations in 1977 and the present, the federal regulations completely prohibited commercial fishing by Indians in reservation waters.

---

[3] The current regulations are contained in sections 250.1 to 250.23 of the Code of Federal Regulations.

B.

Like the present case, McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d 517, was a state criminal prosecution brought against a Yurok Indian for commercial fishing activities committed while the federal regulations were in effect. The People argued in McCovey that because the federal regulations in force at the time of the charged offense themselves prohibited commercial on-reservation fishing by reservation Indians, the state criminal prosecution was compatible with, and not preempted by, federal law.

In McCovey, we reviewed at some length the numerous federal authorities which had considered the question of when a state could permissibly apply its own law to an Indian reservation or to tribal members. We explained that the federal cases had recognized " 'two independent but related barriers to the assertion of state regulatory authority over tribal reservations and members. [Citation.] First, state authority may be preempted by federal law. Second, it may interfere with 'the right of reservation Indians to make their own laws and be ruled by them.' " (McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 525 [quoting White Mountain Apache Tribe v. Bracker (1980) 448 U.S. 136, 142-143].) Furthermore, we noted that the governing federal decisions had established that the preemption doctrine was to be applied with somewhat more vigor in cases involving Indian affairs than in other areas, and had explained that " '[a]lthough a State will certainly be without jurisdiction if its authority is preempted under familiar principles of preemption, . . . prior cases [do] not limit preemption of State laws affecting Indian tribes to only those circumstances.' " (36 Cal.3d at p. 525 [quoting New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe (1983) 462 U.S. 324, 333-334].) We also pointed out that in those circumstances in which there is a "pervasive" or "comprehensive" federal regulatory scheme governing a particular aspect of Indian affairs, the controlling federal cases made it clear that "state laws are preempted if they appear to 'disturb and disarrange' that scheme." (36 Cal.3d at p. 526 [quoting Warren Trading Post v. Tax Comm'n. (1965) 380 U.S. 685, 690-691].)

For guidance in the application of these principles, the McCovey court turned to the then-recent United States Supreme Court decision in New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe

(1983) 462 U.S. 324, which had addressed a preemption question in a setting somewhat similar to McCovey. In Mescalero, the Mescalero Apache Tribe, with extensive federal assistance and supervision, had established a comprehensive scheme for the management of the fish and wildlife resources on its New Mexico reservation, including the regulation of on-reservation hunting and fishing by both members and nonmembers of the Mescalero tribe. In that case, New Mexico conceded that it had no jurisdiction to regulate the on-reservation hunting or fishing activities of tribe members, but contended that it could apply generally applicable state hunting and fishing laws to nonmembers who hunted or fished on the reservation, even when such state laws differed in some respects from the hunting and fishing regulations which had been adopted by the tribe. The United States Supreme Court unanimously rejected New Mexico's contention, concluding, inter alia, that application of state law even to non-Indians "would effectively nullify the Tribe's authority to control hunting and fishing on the reservation" and "would completely 'disturb and disarrange' . . . the comprehensive scheme of federal and tribal management established pursuant to federal law." (462 U.S. at p. 338.)

After reviewing the comprehensive nature of the federal regulatory scheme governing Indian fishing on the Hoopa Valley Reservation, we concluded in McCovey that, as in Mescalero, "[t]here is little question that the exercise of state criminal jurisdiction in this area will 'disturb and disarrange' the federal scheme. [Citation.] Concurrent jurisdiction by the state would supplant the present federal regulatory scheme with an inconsistent dual system." (36 Cal.3d at p. 531.)

As we explained: "The federal regulations permit gill nets to be used to a limited extent, while California completely prohibits their use in the taking of salmon, steelhead or striped bass. [Citations.] The penalties for appellants' conduct in this case are more severe under California law. The maximum fine for a violation of section 8685.6 is $10,000, while the maximum fine under the federal regulations is $500. [Citations.] Violations of the federal regulations are adjudicated in reservation courts before Indian judges and juries, while violations under the Fish and Game Code are adjudicated in non-Indian courts. [¶] Moreover, state jurisdiction over Indian offenses involving fish caught on the reservation would 'effectively nullify' the express purpose of the federal regulations. [Citation.] With the state asserting its authority in the area, there would be no incentive for the Hoopa Valley Reservation Indians ever to establish a reservation-wide system capable of managing and regulating the resources of the reservation. If the tribe did establish a system, its authority to regulate would have but a 'hollow ring' and the exercise of that authority would be 'only at the sufferance of the State.' [Citation.] Thus, state jurisdiction would thwart Congress' overriding commitment to the encouragement of tribal self-government and economic development." (36 Cal.3d at p. 531.)

Finally, the McCovey court turned to the state's claim that its interest in conservation of the scarce salmon resources in the Klamath River nonetheless justified the exercise of state jurisdiction. With respect to this contention, the court noted that while in a nonpreemption context the United States Supreme Court, in the Puyallup trilogy,[4] had held that a state may, in the interest of conservation, regulate Indian fishing rights which were created by treaty, the Supreme Court had never held that concurrent state regulation for conservation purposes is permissible when there is a comprehensive federal regulatory scheme in place which is intended to serve a similar conservation interest and with which the state regulation conflicts. In this context, the McCovey court concluded that "[t]he state's interest in conservation of salmon is adequately protected by the federal regulations. An elaborate federal scheme regulates both on-reservation fishing and off-reservation sales. This factor—entirely absent in the Puyallup cases—is itself sufficient to preclude state intervention. Moreover, the existence of accompanying mechanisms for enforcement should adequately dispel the concern that exclusive federal jurisdiction will impact adversely on state resources." (36 Cal.3d at p. 533.)

---

[4] See Puyallup Tribe v. Dept. of Game (1968) 391 U.S. 392 (Puyallup I); Washington Game Dept. v. Puyallup Tribe (1973) 414 U.S. 44 (Puyallup II); Puyallup Tribe v. Washington Game Dept. (1977) 433 U.S. 165 (Puyallup III).

As a consequence, the McCovey decision squarely held that the state was preempted from exercising jurisdiction over Indian fishing activities encompassed by the federal regulations.

IV

As the Court of Appeal recognized, on its face the McCovey decision appears to be on all fours with the instant matter. Defendants, like McCovey, are Yurok Indians charged with violating state fish and game laws on the basis of on-reservation fishing activities which were governed by an applicable comprehensive federal regulatory scheme. Nonetheless, the Court of Appeal determined that McCovey was not controlling in the present case. The Court of Appeal relied on two grounds to support its conclusion, but, as we explain, neither ground withstands scrutiny.

A.

First, the Court of Appeal suggested that a legal notice published in July 1985 by the local area director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, indicating that the salmon population in the Klamath River continued to decline after our decision in McCovey,[5] demonstrated that the state's interest in conserving a

---

[5] The notice in question, entitled "In-Season Regulation Change Indian Fishing Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation," stated in relevant part: "Under the regulations of the Interior Department governing Indian fishing on the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation, the Area Director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs is authorized to make in-season and emergency changes to the regulations when necessary to ensure proper management of the fisheries of the Klamath and Trinity Rivers. [¶] . . . The Bureau of Indian Affairs finds that the anadromous fish resources of the Klamath River Basin are in greater jeopardy in 1985 than they were in 1979. Chinook stocks have declined , . . The run size has reached a point where the spawning population on some tributary streams in the Klamath Basin may be in danger of being elininated. Any further reductions in run size also make the resource increasingly vulnerable to the adverse impacts of natural phenomena such as drought, flood or high ocean temperature . . . [¶] The precarious state of threatened natural resource had become sufficiently compelling to justify concurrent state jurisdiction over Indian fishing in the Klamath River.

To begin with, however, even if a change in circumstances subsequent to McCovey might justify the state's institution of emergency measures to protect a threatened resource from imminent extinction, such a rationale could not be applied to sustain the criminal charges at issue in this case, which are based on conduct which occurred in 1981, three years prior to the McCovey decision. A change of circumstances after McCovey obviously could not alter the preemptive effect of the federal regulations in a case which arose well before McCovey.

Furthermore, in light of our analysis in McCovey, it is clear that a mere change of circumstances—such as the continuing decline in the salmon runs in the Klamath River—would not in itself be sufficient to alter that decision's preemption determination, particularly in the absence of a showing that the federal government or tribal authorities were failing to take conservation measures to protect the endangered resource. Here, the Bureau of Indian Affairs document to which the Court of Appeal referred itself the resouce has caused the United States Commerce Department and the states of California and Oregon to ban the commercial harvest of salmon in those waters that have high concentrations of Klamath origin chinook. The Bureau of Indian Affairs has already responded to this crisis by imposing closures on the Indian fishery designed to significantly enhance the escapement of salmon to the spawning area. [¶] The Bureau of Indian Affairs has concluded that these closures will produce the required harvest reductions to preserve the resource and allow limited fishing for ceremonial and subsistence purposes. There is a significant risk that these closures will not result in the necessary harvest reductions if fishing pressure is increased by persons intending to sell all or part of their catch. . . . [¶] The Interior Department recently issued a draft environmental impact statement which proposed to permit the exercise of Indian commercial fishing rights pursuant to a fishery management plan when the expected run size exceeds subsistence, ceremonial and spawning needs. Those conditions do not exist for the 1985 season. [¶] Based on the foregoing considerations, commercial fishing on the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation and the sale of fish caught on that reservation is prohibited."

---

demonstrates that the federal authorities had in fact taken substantial action in response to the increased risk to Klamath River salmon, and were by no means defaulting in their conservation tasks. (See fn. 5, ante.)[6] Under these circumstances, we conclude that there was no justification for the Court of Appeal's determination that McCovey's holding was no longer controlling.[7]

B.

The Court of Appeal alternatively suggested that because the McCovey decision did not explicitly advert to the fact that a majority of Klamath River salmon are hatched outside the Hoopa Valley Reservation, in state fish hatcheries or other nonreservation spawning grounds, "[o]ne may read [the McCovey] holding

---

[6] The parties have presented a number of reports, prepared by federal and state agencies which monitor fishing runs in the Klamath River, which indicate that the size of the salmon runs in the river has increased significantly since July 1985. The improvement has apparently resulted, at least in substantial part, from the cooperative efforts of numerous federal and state agencies which have jurisdiction over various aspects of both ocean and in-river salmon fishing. (See 16 U.S.C. § 460ss et seq., added by Pub.L. No. 99-552 (Oct. 27, 1986) 100 Stat. 3080 [establishing Klamath Fishery Management Council]; Fish & G. Code, § 16500 et seq., added by Stats. 1986, ch. 1186, § 1, pp. ____ [authorizing state representative to negotiate and approve agreement authorizing commercial fishing by Indians in Klamath River under specified circumstances].)

[7] In his concurring opinion, Justice Kaufman suggests that under McCovey and the relevant federal authorities, the state retains the right to adopt new provisions applicable to Indian fishing on the reservation if the provisions are narrowly tailored to meet an exigency threatening an endangered species and if the state can adduce sufficient facts to show that such a regulation serves a compelling interest which the federal regulations do not address or fail to safeguard. (See post, p. [typed opn., pp. 3-4].) Because no such newly adopted, narrowly tailored state regulation is involved in this case, we have no occasion to decide whether such a state provision could properly coexist with the applicable federal regulations (cf. Metlakatla Indians v. Egan (1962) 369 U.S. 45) and we express no opinion on that matter.

as limited solely to those fish resources which spawn in reservation waters or which were stocked by [Department of] Interior fisheries." The Court of Appeal was apparently of the opinion that McCovey's preemption analysis was applicable only to "an exclusive reservation resource" and did not apply to fish which originated outside of the reservation.

To begin with, we believe it is clear from the McCovey decision that the McCovey court was well aware that a substantial portion of Klamath River salmon spawn outside reservation waters. (See McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 524, fn. 7.) Furthermore, the Court of Appeal cited no authority which suggests that Indian fishing rights in reservation waters extend only to fish which are hatched within the boundaries of the reservation, and we know of no decision which supports such a proposition. (Cf. United States v. State of Washington (9th Cir. 1985) 759 F.2d 1353, 1358-1360, cert. den. 474 U.S. 994 [state hatchery fish are subject to allocation under Indian treaties].) In any event, the state provisions at issue in this case do not purport to draw any distinction between fish which hatch outside reservation waters and those which hatch within the reservation but rather extend their broad prohibitions to all fish. Even if a state could properly establish a special interest in the regulation of a state-created resource, it would clearly be incompatible with the independent nature of Indian fishing rights to suggest that a state may obtain broad authority to prohibit all on-reservation gill-net or commercial fishing by reservation Indians whenever it establishes hatcheries outside a reservation and permits fish from such hatcheries to pass through reservation waters.

Thus we conclude that the fact that many Klamath River salmon hatch outside the boundaries of the Hoopa Valley Reservation, has no effect on our holding in McCovey that the applicable federal regulations—which draw no distinction between reservation- and nonreservation-bred salmon—preempt the state from applying the relevant state fish and game laws to on-reservation fishing activities by reservation Indians.

Accordingly, neither of the rationales on which the Court of Appeal relied justifies a departure from the McCovey ruling.

V.

The People alternatively suggest that the result reached by the Court of Appeal should be sustained on an entirely different, and much more radical and far-reaching, theory. The People maintain (1) that, notwithstanding McCovey and numerous other state and federal decisions, the Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation in fact do not possess any federally reserved fishing rights in the Klamath River at all, and (2) that the federal government lacked the constitutional authority to establish the regulations over Hoopa Valley Reservation fishing which this court found preemptive in McCovey. The People argue that when California was admitted to statehood in 1850 the Klamath River was a navigable body of water whose title passed from the federal government to the state (see, e.g., Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan (1845) 44 U.S. (3 How.) 212; Shively v. Bowlby (1894) 152 U.S. 1), and thus in 1891 the federal government had no interest in the Klamath River or its fish resources that it could properly pass to the Indians through the creation of the reservation. The People assert that the federal authorities recognized this state of affairs in 1891 and that the 1891 federal executive order which extended the original Hoopa Valley Reservation to include the old Klamath River Reservation actually excluded the Klamath River from the reservation. According to the People's argument, California retains sole jurisdiction over the Klamath River and its fish resources and thus may regulate Indian fishing in the Klamath River free from any federal restraints.

To support the argument, the People request the court to take judicial notice of a number of historical documents which they assert support their interpretation of the 1891 executive order.[8]

---

[8] The historical documents include (1) an 1889 opinion of the United States Attorney General (S. Exec. Doc. No. 140, 50th Cong., 2d Sess. (1889) printed in 4 Sen. Exec. Docs., 50th Cong., 2d Sess. and Special Sess. (Mar. 4, 1889), Nos. 131-147); (2) a letter, dated January 20, 1891, from the Office of the Assistant Attorney General for the Department of the Interior to the Secretary of the Interior; (3) a letter, dated October 12, 1891, from the Secretary of the Interior to the President of the United States; and (4) a 1940 opinion of the Solicitor of the Defendants vigorously oppose the request, suggesting that many of the purportedly factual statements in the documents are actually subject to dispute and additionally maintaining that the documents should have been presented at the preliminary hearing. We need not decide whether defendants' objections to judicial notice are well taken because we conclude that, in any event, the legal theory on which the People rely is untenable for a number of reasons.

To begin with, the People's broad claim that Yurok Indians enjoy no federally protected fishing rights in the Klamath River flies directly in the face of all of the recent federal and state decisions involving Yurok Indian fishing on the Hoopa Valley Reservation. As we have seen, in 1975 the California Court of Appeal specifically held in Five Gill Nets, supra, 48 Cal.App.3d 454, certiorari denied (1976) 425 U.S. 907, that state regulation of such on-reservation Indian fishing was preempted by the Indians' federally protected fishing rights; that holding, of course, is totally incompatible with People's present contention that the Yurok Indians enjoy no federally protected fishing rights in the Klamath River. Similarly, more recent federal decisions have likewise expressly recognized that "[t]he right to take fish from the Klamath River was reserved to the Indians when the reservation was created." (United States v. Eberhardt, supra, 789 F.2d 1354, 1359; see Blake v. Arnett, supra, 663 F.2d 906, 909; Pacific Coast Fed. v. Secretary of Commerce (N.D. Cal. 1980) 494 F.Supp. 626, 632, 633.) And, of course, our McCovey decision also expressly held that the Yurok Indians possess federally reserved fishing rights in the Klamath River which are properly subject to federal regulation. (McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 534.)

Although the People acknowledge that their current contention is inconsistent with the opinions in each of these cases, they argue that because none of the prior decisions expressly considered the particular historical evidence or legal theory on which they now rely, those decisions should not be considered controlling authority. The reach of those decisions, however, may not be so readily circumvented. The issue of the existence of federally reserved Indian fishing rights was directly in question in each of these cases, and the State of California was in fact a principal litigant in several of the proceedings. The People had ample opportunity in the prior litigation to challenge the validity of Indian fishing rights in the Klamath River on the theory they now urge. Having failed to successfully pursue such a legal argument in those cases, they may not avoid the holdings of those decisions at this juncture by resort to ostensibly newly discovered historic evidence or a new legal theory. (See, e.g., Price v. Sixth District Agricultural Assn. (1927) 201 Cal. 502, 511 ["an issue may not be thus split into pieces. If it has been determined in a former action, it is binding notwithstanding the parties litigant may have omitted to urge for or against it matters which, if urged, would have produced an opposite result."].) This is particularly true in a situation, like the present one, where many individuals have relied on the past decisions over a number of years and where a comprehensive federal regulatory scheme—adopted in the wake of the earlier decisions—has been in place for more than a decade. (Cf. Arizona v. California (1963) 373 U.S. 546, 598.)

---

Department of the Interior (1 Opns. Solic., Dept. of Inter. Rel. to Indian Affairs (1917-1974) pp. 945-948.)

Furthermore, the People's argument is not only defeated by the past judicial decisions but fails on its substantive merits as well. The People's fundamental assertion—that, after California's entry into the union, the federal government lost any right to reserve Indian fishing rights in the Klamath River through the establishment of an Indian reservation on federally owned land adjacent to the river—is quite similar to a claim which the United States Supreme Court expressly rejected 25 years ago in the case of Arizona v. California, supra, 373 U.S. 546. In that case, the State of Arizona challenged the right of the federal government to reserve water rights for Indians in the Colorado River through the creation of new Indian reservations in Arizona after Arizona had become a state. In rejecting the claim, the court explained: "Arizona's contention that the Federal Government had no power, after Arizona became a State, to reserve waters for the use and benefit of federally reserved lands rests largely upon statements in Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, . . . and Shively v. Bowlby. . . . Those cases and others that followed them gave rise to the doctrine that lands underlying navigable waters within territory acquired by the Government are held in trust for future States and that title to such lands is automatically vested in the States upon admission to the Union. But those cases involved only the shores of and lands beneath navigable waters. They do not determine the problem before us and cannot be accepted as limiting the broad powers of the United States to regulate navigable waters under the Commerce Clause and to regulate government lands under Art. IV, § 3, of the Constitution. We have no doubt about the power of the United States under these clauses to reserve water rights for its reservations and its property." (373 U.S. at pp. 597-598 [emphasis added, fn. omitted]; see also United States v. New Mexico (1978) 438 U.S. 696, 698.) Although the reserved rights in Arizona v. California involved the Indians' use of water for irrigation purposes, the People have cited no authority which suggests that Indian fishing rights, which may be equally central to Indian survival and self-sufficiency, are any less eligible for federal reservation and protection. (See Blake v. Arnett, supra, 663 F.2d 906, 909 ["at the time when the Reservation was first created," the fishing rights of Yurok Indians " 'were not much less necessary to the existence of the Indians than the atmosphere they breathed' "]. See generally United States v. Winans (1905) 198 U.S. 371, 381-382; Menominee Tribe v. United States (1968) 391 U.S. 404, 406; F. Cohen, Handbook of Federal Indian Law (1982 ed.) ch. 8, § B2, pp. 449-450.)

The People additionally argue that even if the federal government had the power to reserve Indian fishing rights in the Klamath River when it extended the Hoopa Valley Reservation in 1891, the contemporaneous historical documents of which they urge the court to take judical notice demonstrate that there was in fact no intent to reserve such rights. The documents in question, however, go no further than to indicate that the state, upon entry into the union, acquired title to the river bed of the Klamath River and its resources; they do not state, nor imply, that the federal government, in extending the Hoopa Valley Reservation to include the old Klamath River Reservation, did not intend to protect the Indians' traditional fishing rights in the river. Indeed, as a number of judicial decisions have recognized, the Indians' fishing activities in the Klamath River were in fact central to the 1891 extension of the reservation.

Three quarters of a century ago, the United States Supreme Court, in Donnelly v. United States, supra, 228 U.S. 243—the initial decision analyzing the 1891 extension of the original Hoopa Valley Reservation to include the old Klamath River Reservation—emphasized the primary role that the river and Indian fishing activities played in the decision to establish the current boundaries of the reservation. As the court observed: "[I]n view of all the circumstances, it would be absurd to treat the [1891 executive] order as intended to include the uplands to the width of one mile on each side of the river, and at the same time to exclude the river. . . . The reports of the local Indian agents and superintendents to the Commissioners of Indian Affairs abound in references to fishing as their principal subsistence, and the river is described as running in a narrow canyon through a broken country, the Indians as dwelling in small villages close to its banks. [Citations.]" (Emphasis added.) (228 U.S. at p. 259.)[9] In short, the reason the extension of the Hoopa Valley Reservation took the form that it did was in recognition of the Yurok Indians' historic reliance on the fish resources of the Klamath River. (See also Mattz v. Arnett, supra, 412 U.S. 481, 487; Arnett v. Five Gill Nets, supra, 48 Cal.App.3d 454, 461; Pacific Coast Fed. v. Secretary of Commerce, supra, 494 F.Supp. 626, 633.) Thus, we [9] In the initial opinion issued in Donnelly, the Supreme Court concluded both that the river was included in the reservation and that the then-applicable California statutes established that, for purposes of California law, the Klamath River was considered a non-navigable stream. (228 U.S. at pp. 259-264.) On petition for rehearing, the defendant took issue with the court's interpretation of the California statutes relating to navigability, and the court—noting that the navigability question had not been pursued at trial—withdrew that portion of its initial opinion relating to the California statutes on navigability. (228 U.S. at pp. 708-712.) The court nonetheless upheld the defendant's conviction, reaffirming the conclusion that the trial court has properly found that the crime, which had been committed either on the river or its banks, was committed within the reservation and fell within the jurisdiction of the federal statute.

---

reject the People's contention that the United States lacked either the power or the intent to protect the Yurok Indians' historic fishing rights in the Klamath River when it extended the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation in 1891.

VI.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal is reversed and the proceeding is remanded to that court with directions to issue a peremptory writ of prohibition restraining further prosecution of the underlying criminal charges.

ARGUELLES, J.

WE CONCUR:

Lucas, C.J.
Broussard, J.
Eagleson, J.

COPY

MATTZ v. SUPERIOR COURT
S002805

CONCURRING OPINION BY KAUFMAN, J.

I concur in the judgment, but write separately out of a concern that the majority opinion may be read as holding that the State of California is forever and in all circumstances barred from acting to preserve a scarce natural resource located on Indian lands within the state. As explained below, I do not read either People v. McCovey (1984) 36 Cal.3d 517 or the pertinent federal authorities as so holding, nor, in my view, does our decision today preclude the exercise of concurrent state jurisdiction over tribal activities on Indian lands where the state's interest is sufficiently compelling. Both the United States Supreme Court and the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals have held that the preservation of a scarce, common resource may constitute such an interest. (New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe (1983) 462 U.S. 324, 342; Puyallup Tribe v. Washington Game Dept. (1977) 433 U.S. 165, 173-177; United States v. State of Or. (9th Cir. 1983) 718 F.2d 299, 304-305; see also People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 532, fn. 18.) When federal law is silent or unavailing, state law must be adequate to preserve the survival of endangered fish and wildlife resources.

A. Prosecution Is Barred in This Case

As noted above, I concur in the majority's conclusion that our holding in McCovey bars the prosecution of defendants in this matter. The alleged violations of Fish and Game Code sections 8434 and 8685.6 occurred in 1981, three years prior to our holding in McCovey that federal regulations preempt the state's fishery conservation laws as applied to the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation. Thus, McCovey is clearly dispositive of this matter. Even if one were to accept the Court of Appeal's novel theory that changes in the escapement levels of Klamath River salmon could somehow resurrect sections 8434 and 8685.6 from the dustbin of preemption, the prosecution in this case would not be valid, as the violations occurred prior to the alleged change of curcumstances.

Moreover, the broader ramifications of the Court of Appeal's theory are simply unacceptable. When escapement levels of salmon are high, the theory suggests, McCovey governs; when low, McCovey may be ignored. The Court of Appeal would thus reduce our holding to little more than a chimera, subject to the whim of the prosecutor and the fortunes of the anadromous fish. Clearly, this approach must be rejected.

Equally unacceptable, however, is the notion—vigorously condemned by Justice Mosk in his dissenting opinion—that "the State of California is necessarily and for all time barred from conserving a natural resource located within its borders." (Dis. opn. of Mosk, J. at p. [typed opn. at p. 1].) Our decision in McCovey, it should be emphasized, does not stand for the proposition that federal "conservation" regulations preempt this state's environmental protection laws under any and all circumstances. While a full exploration of McCovey's impact on cases unrelated to the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation must necessarily await another day, it is clear, in my view, that even "pervasive" federal regulatory schemes leave room for state laws directed explicitly to the preservation of an endanged species and supported by a sufficiently compelling factual record.

In the unusual case, such as that presented here, where we previously held that existing federal regulations "adequately protected" the state's interest (People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 533), but subsequent events occur which suggest otherwise, a valid assertion of state regulatory authority would require (1) that the state adopt new provisions narrowly tailored to meet the exigency, and (2) adduce sufficient facts to show that the state law serves a compelling interest which the federal regulations do not address or fail to safeguard. Although the state in this matter failed to meet these criteria, as explained below, I believe that both state and federal decisions allow such an exercise of state authority.

B. Federal Preemption of State Environmental Laws

So far as I am aware, no court has ever decided that a state lacks the power to regulate tribal fishing on an Indian reservation in the express interest of preserving an endangered anadromous fish population. Mattz v. Arnett (1973) 412 U.S. 481 held merely that the Klamath River Reservation had not been extinguished, but expressed no view as to the state's authority to regulate fishing on the reservation. (Id. at p. 485.) On remand in Arnett v. Five Gill Nets (1975) 43 Cal.App.3d 454, the Court of Appeal did not reach the issue because it found that state intervention "in the interest of preserving the fish" was not supported by the record. (Id. at pp. 463-464.) Similarly, our decision in McCovey was based, in part, on the fact that the state had not shown the exercise of its police power was necessary to preserve a scarce, common resource. (36 Cal.3d at pp. 532-533.) Our holding today, in my view, stands only for the limited proposition that state intervention may not be premised upon laws previously held to be preempted.

What these and other decisions do establish, however, is the principle that state jurisdiction over fish and wildlife resources located on federally regulated Indian reservations depends, in part, upon the nature of the state interests asserted. Though it is admittedly the rare case, the United States Supreme Court has nevertheless expressly recognized "that in exceptional circumstances a State may assert jurisdiction over the on-reservation activities of tribal members." (New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe, supra, 462 U.S. at pp. 331-322.) In so stating, it is significant that the high court referred expressly to Puyallup Tribe v. Washington Game Dept., supra, 433 U.S. 165, the third in a trilogy of cases dealing with the State of Washington's authority to regulate on-reservation fishing by members of the Puyallup tribe. Though not a preemption matter, the United States Supreme Court's recognition of the State of Washington's "power to conserve an important natural resource" is significant. (Id. at p. 175.) Coupled with Justice Douglas's typically pungent observation in Puyallup II (Washington Game Dept. v. Puyallup Tribe (1973) 414 U.S. 44) that the State of Washington's "police power . . . is adequate to prevent the steelhead [trout] from following the fate of the passenger pigeon," (id. at p.49), it suggests that a state's jurisidction to preserve an endangered species survives the enactment of a federal regulatory scheme—even one which includes "conservation" among its stated goals.

Preemption of California environmental protection laws does not automatically follow from a finding that federal regulations applicable to Indian lands appear to address "similar" concerns. (Maj. opn., ante, at p. [typed opn. at p. 19].) The instant matter presents a classic case in point. The fishing regulations promulgated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs for the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation state several goals: the protection of the reservation's fishery resources, the ensurance of equal access to the fishery resources by all eligible Indians, the preservation of fishing for traditional subsistence and ceremonial purposes as well as the promotion of economic self-sufficiency through commercial fishing. (25 C.F.R., §§ 250.1, 250.9.) The federal regulations permit the limited use of gill nets for these purposes. (25 C.F.R., § 250.9.)

McCovey found—on the facts presented—that the foregoing federal scheme "adequately protected" the "state's interest in the conservation of salmon." (36 Cal.3d at p. 533.) As we explained: "[T]he state has not shown that its interest in conservation is sufficient to justify assertion of concurrent authority. Thus, the state is preempted from exercising jurisdiction over appellant McCovey." (Ibid.)

McCovey, however, did not consider the validity of state intervention pursuant to a state statute or regulation enacted for the express preservationist or "environmentalist" purpose of preserving an endangered species from imminent extinction. I do not mean to suggest that this is the only circumstance in which state intervention would be proper. I do suggest, however, that an environmentalist measure of this nature differs in kind from the typical "conservationist" regulations enacted by the Bureau of Indian Affairs under the aegis of the Department of the Interior. The objective of the federal government in this, as in many other cases, is sustained economic development on the reservation enlightened by rational management of its resources. This "scientific" approach to resource management lies at the heart of the "conservationist" ethic, an idea championed by the Progressives at the turn of the century and since institutionalized by resource management experts in various government agencies. (See Hays, Conservation and the Gospel of Efficiency: The Progressive Conservation Movement 1890-1920 (1959) pp. 1-4, 145-146.) "Environmentalism," on the other hand, is a movement of more recent origins, and generally has as its goal the preservation of resources from development. (See Schrepfer, The Fight to Save the Redwoods: A History of Environmental Reform 1917-1978 (1983) pp. 16, 229-244; Weyeneth, The Color Green: Politics in the Age of Ecology (1988) 16 Reviews in American History 298, 303-305.)

I am not suggesting that the federal regulations at issue here contemplate the annihilation of the Klamath River salmon. On the contrary, as noted above, they appear to seek sustained economic development. I do suggest, however, that federal conservationist goals are not necessarily congruent with local environmental concerns. The federal regulations, it must be remembered, seek to create private rights on the reservation for purely personal financial gain. As the Court of Appeal noted, however, that small stretch of the Klamath River which passes through the reservation serves as a veritable "gateway" for salmon seeking freshwater spawning grounds hundreds of kilometers away from the reservation. Many of these salmon actually originated in state-operated hatcheries located off the reservation. What occurs on the reservation may dramatically affect fishery resources throughout the state. Thus, the state has a distinct and valid interest in the preservation of this common resource for all of its citizens.

Accordingly, the existence of a federal regulatory scheme that purportedly includes among its goals the "conservation" of reservation resources does not terminate the preemption analysis. Courts must continue to determine the respective federal, state and tribal interests, and where a sufficiently compelling environmental concern—such as the preservation of an endangered species—necessitates state enforcement, must be free to find concurrent state jurisdiction.

KAUFMAN, J.

I CONCUR:

PANELLI, J.

COPY

MATTZ et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT

S002805

DISSENTING OPINION BY MOSK, J.

I dissent.

The majority embrace the opinion of Chief Justice Bird for a unanimous court in People v. McCovey (1984) 36 Cal.3d 517. I agreed with that opinion and signed it.

However, I do not concede that the State of California is necessarily and for all time barred from conserving a natural resource within its borders. As was pointed out in Donahue v. Jusitce Court (1971) 15 Cal.App.3d 557, 564: "Congress may, of course, enact legislation limiting the right . . . to fish on the reservation. . . . Likewise the state is not precluded from exercising its general police power under factual situations reasonably requiring the exercise of such power." I believe the State of California has now demonstrated a factual situation justifying the use of its police power.

It is not necessary to recite the entire opinion of the Court of Appeal in this case, but I do adopt as my own the concolusion of Justice Haning, for himself and Presiding Justice Low and Justice King:

We conclude that the state's concurrent jurisdiction over tribal salmon fishing in the Klamath River is not preempted by the federal regulations. We are of the view that McCovey does not directly apply to the case before us, for two reasons.

First, in the context of the conservation of a finite, threatened natural resource the state's regulatory ability is not static. The conservation of such a natural resource is sufficiently compelling to enable the state to assert a more powerful need for conservation. The People have presented clear indications that after McCovey was decided the Klamath River population continued to decline. The Bureau of Indian Affairs found that the salmon population was in greater jeopardy in 1985 than in 1979 when the moratorium was first imposed. In fact, the bureau concluded—after McCovey was decided—that the spawning run was "in danger of being eliminated." McCovey, as well controlling precedent of the United States Supreme Court, does not preclude concurrent state jurisdiction over a precarious state resource. As the Ninth Circuit has recently ruled, a state may regulate Indian fishing if its regulation is reasonable and necessary for conservation. "Unlike Congress, states may not qualify Indian fishing rights. Puyallup Tribe v. Department of Game (Puyallup I), 391 U.S. 392, 398 (1968); [United States v.] Sohappy, 770 F.2d [816,] 823; [United States v.] Fryberg, 622 F.2d [1010], 1014-15. However, states may regulate Indian rights in the interest of conservation by an appropriate exercise of their police power. State regulation for conservation purposes is based on the state's interest in protecting fish and wildlife resources for the benefit of its citizens. See Puyallup Tribe v. Department of Game (Puyallup III), 433 U.S. 165, 175-76 (1977); see also United States v. Michigan, 653 F.2d 277, 279 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1124 (1981). The violation of state conservation laws is a federal offense. 16 U.S.C. § 3372(a)(2) (1982); see Sohappy, 770 F.2d at 834-24. [¶] A state must show that any regulation of Indian fishing rights is both reasonable and necessary for conservation purposes. Antoine v. Washington, 420 U.S. 194, 207 (1975); Sohappy, 770 F.2d at 823. State regulations meeting these standards may extend to the manner of fishing, the size of the take, and the restriction of commercial fishing. Puyallup I, 391 U.S. at 398. In the context of state regulation of Indian fishing rights, we have rejected the endangered species approach to conservation, finding that fishing limitations may be proper even though extinction is not imminent. United States v. Oregon, 718 F.2d 299, 305 (9th Cir. 1983)." (United States v. Eberhardt, supra, 789 F.2d at pp. 1361-1362.) In light of the post-McCovey diminution of the salmon run to the point of imminent demise, we can easily distinguish the situation which now faces us from that [in McCovey in 1984].

Second, and perhaps of greater signifiance, McCovey, as well as Arnett [Arnett v. Five Gill Nets (1975) 48 Cal.App.3d 454] assumed the Klamath river salmon at issue therein were exclusively a reservation resource. One may read its holding as limited solely to those fish resources which spawn in reservation waters or which were stocked by Interior fisheries. In fact, however, the majority of Klamath River salmon runs are a state resource, which has been substantially enhanced over the years by stocking efforts of the State Resources Agency at the Iron Gate Salmon and Steelhead Hatchery, located outside the Reservation boundary upstream from the reservation. (See, e.g., State of Cal. Resources Agency, Dept. of Fish & Game, Ann. Rep. Iron Gate Salmon & Steelhead Hatchery 1983-1984, Admin. Rep. No. 85-01 (1985), of which we take judicial notice.)

McCovey did not hold that California's salmon and steelhead stock, added to the upstream Klamath waters through state fish hatcheries or other nonreservation spawning grounds, is to be governed by the same considerations as an exclusive reservation resource such as the deer resource discussed in Mescalero [New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe (1983) 462 U.S. 324]. Neither McCovey nor Arnett held that the state could not protect its own fish from extinction. We therefore conclude that the anadromous fish traversing the Klamath River passage are not under the total dominion of the Yurok Tribe, and petitioners' gill netting may be regulated by the State of California in the interests of conservation, and the protection of its own fish.

Accordingly, the petition for writ of prohibition [should be] denied. [End of Court of Appeal opinion, parallel citations omitted, fn. omitted.]

MOSK, J.

Appendix B

CERTIFIED FOR PUBLICATION

IN THE COURT OF APPEAL
OF THE
STATE OF CALIFORNIA
FIRST APPELLATE DISTRICT
DIVISION FIVE

A024108
Del Norte County Superior Court
No. 82-053

Diane Sue Mattz, Antone Folkins and Kenneth Mattz, Petitioners,

v.

Superior Court of the State of California for the County of Del Norte, Respondent,
People of the State of California,
Real Party in Interest.

In this decision we hold that for purposes of protecting state hatched fish returning to state hatcheries and spawning grounds, and also to prevent the extinction of a valuable natural resource, the State of California may reasonably regulate commercial gill netting by members of the Yurok Indian tribe on the Klamath River.

Petitioners are members of the Yurok Tribe who commercially fish the Klamath River on Northern California's Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation. They are charged in the Superior Court of Del Norte County with violating and conspiring to violate criminal provisions of the California Fish & Game Code which prohibit the sale of fish taken from the Klamath River by means of a gill net. (Fish & G. Code, §§ 8434, 8685.6; Penal Code, § 182.) Petitioners seek a writ of prohibition to prevent further criminal proceedings, contending that California state law is preempted by the federal regulations governing fishing on the Hoopa Valley Reservation, which have been promulgated under the authority of the federal government to regulate Indian affairs. In response, the People assert a state interest in conservation of the Klamath River salmon population, which they contend is sufficient to counteract federal preemption and permit the exercise of concurrent state jurisdiction over Indian commercial fishing. We agree with the People and deny the peremptory writ.

I

This is but the latest chapter in the legal history of the Hoopa Valley Reservation and the fishing activities of the Yurok tribe. To present this case in its proper context, we preface our discussion with a brief review of the history and background of the Reservation and governmental attempts at regulating the salmon fishing of the Reservation tribes.

The Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation consists of a one-mile strip of land on either side of the Klamath River, beginning at the river's mouth at the Pacific Ocean and extending upstream to the River's confluence with the Trinity River. At this point of confluence the Reservation widens to a 12-mile square. (See People v. McCovey (1984) 36 Cal.3d 517, 521, cert. denied (1985) 469 U.S. 1062; Mattz v. Arnett (1973) 412 U.S. 481. [A map of the Reservation is attached as an appendix to both the Mattz and the McCovey decisions.])[1] The Yurok tribe, whose name means "down the river," inhabits the downriver portion of the Reservation which encompasses the lower Klamath River. (Mattz v. Arnett, supra, 412 U.S. at pp. 485-86, citing A. Kroeber, Handbook of the Indians of California, published as Bulletin 78, Bureau of American Ethnology 1-97 (1925); and S. Powers,

---

[1] For detailed accounts of the history and geography of the Hoopa Valley Reservation, see Mattz v. Arnett, supra, 412 U.S. at pp. 485-503; People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at pp. 523-24; and United States v. Wilson (D.C.Cal. 1985) 611 F.Supp. 813, 815, revs'd and remd'd United States v. Eberhardt, (9th Cir. 1986) 789 F.2d 1354. See also Arnett v. Five Gill Nets (1975) 48 Cal.App.3d 454, 456-58, cert. den. (1976) 425 U.S. 907; Elser v. Gill Net Number One (1966) 246 Cal.App.2d 30, 33-34; and Donnelly v. United States (1913) 228 U.S. 243, 253-59, for additional historical background.

Tribes of California, published as 3 Contributions to North American Ethnology 44-64 (1877).)

The Klamath river serves as a passageway for several species of anadromous fish, including salmon and steelhead. "Anadromous species hatch in fresh water, grow to maturity in the ocean, and return to fresh-water streams to spawn." (United States v. Eberhardt, supra, 789 U.S. at p. 1357, fn. 4.) The Klamath River salmon and steelhead begin their lives in the freshwater spawning grounds at the headwaters of the River and its tributaries and in state-owned hatcheries, and swim out to the Pacific to maturity. The relatively small number of fish which survive to reach the sea and grow to maturity return to the headwaters of their birth to spawn the next generation. The salmon then die. The returning salmon and steelhead travel upstream in large schools, or "runs," which become targets for commercial fishers who drape gillnets across the river, capturing substantial portions of the run before it can reach the upstream spawning grounds.[2] Because a small portion of the Klamath River flows through the confines of the lower Hoopa Valley Reservation, virtually all of the commercial fishers are Yurok Indians who claim a tribal right to commercially fish the river.

To preserve the anadromous fish resource and achieve minimum desirable population levels in the next generation, a minimum "escapement level" must be ensured; i.e., a certain minimum number of fish must escape the gill nets and return to their spawning grounds. (See United States v. Eberhardt, supra, 789 F.2d at p. 1357, fn. 4; see also People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d 517, 524, fn. 7.) Largely to ensure an escapement level sufficient to preserve the salmon population, both the United States Government and the State of California regulate, or attempt to regulate, commercial fishing on the Klamath River.

---

[2] "A gill net is a 'flat net suspended vertically in the water with meshes that allow the head of a fish to pass trhough or become entangled.' (25 C.F.R. § 250.4.) when a fish gets caught in the net, it helplessly struggles to free itself. In the process, the net takes a band of scales off the fish leaving markings referred to as 'gill net marks.' " (People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 521, fn. 3.)

State regulation of salmon fishing began in 1933 with the enactment of California Fish and Game Code section 8434, an outright prohibition of commercial fishing on the Klamath River. The state's regulatory role receded in the wake of the Court of Appeal's decision in Arnett v. Five Gill Nets (1975) 48 Cal.App.3d 454, cert. denied (1976) 425 U.S. 907, which held that federal law preempted the state's power to regulate fishing on the Klamath within the confines of the lower Hoopa Valley Reservation.

Arnett's ban on state regulation, coupled with the lack of a tribal governing body to assume responsibility for regulating the Indian fishers, created a regulatory void which prompted the federal government to enter the arena in 1977. The federal government promulgated fishing regulations under its authority to regulate Indian affairs through the Department of the Interior (Interior). Interior enacted interim regulations governing Klamath River fishing by Hoopa Valley Indians. (42 Fed. Reg. 40904-40905 (Aug. 12, 1977).) The regulations expressly recognized the Indians had a federally reserved fishing right which included the right to fish commercially in the River; however, the regulations noted the right, like most, was not absolute: "[T]he Indians must be allowed to fish commercially as long as statistics show that there can be effective conservation, with simultaneous regulation of other forms of fishing by all persons." (43 Fed. Reg. 30048 (July 13, 1978), emphasis added.)

By 1979, commercial fishing activity had depleted the Klamath River salmon population to the point of insufficient escapement levels, endangering the survival of the species. In response, Interior declared a moratorium on commercial fishing by Reservation Indians. (44 Fed. Reg. 17144-17151 (Mar. 20, 1979).) The moratorium was seen as "the only means by which [Interior] could ensure that a sufficient number of returning fish escaped to reach the spawning areas at the headwaters, thereby permitting conservation and perpetuation of the resource." (People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 524, fn. 7, citing 44 Fed. Reg.17144, supra.)[3] The 1979 moratorium was imposed subject to removel if salmon runs increased to safer levels (44 Fed. Reg. at p. 17146), but the moratorium "remains in effect, having been renewed in successive versions of the regulations." (People v. McCovey, supra at p. 524; 25 C.F.R. § 250.8, subds. (d), (e).)

The state continued to urge its right and power to regulate Klamath River fishing. In People v. McCovey, supra, the California Supreme Court held that the Interior regulations pre-empted state regulatory authority over the off-reservation sale of reservation catches, with which petitioners are charged, and would at first blush appear to entitle petitioners to a writ of prohibition restraining further prosecution on the state criminal charges. Upon further review we conclude McCovey does not bind us to issue the writ, and that the state's interest in conservation of a natural resource justifies concurrent state and federal regulatory jurisdiction over commercial Klamath River fishing.

II

We begin by reviewing the pertinent pronouncements of the United States Supreme Court in the field of federal preemption of state regulation of Indian affairs.

"[T]here is no rigid rule by which to resolve the question whether a particular state law may be applied to an Indian reservation or to tribal members." (White Mountain Apache Tribe v. Bracker (1980) 448 U.S. 136, 142.) Such questions must

---

[3] The Department recognized that the majority of Klamath salmon were taken by offshore commercial fishing vessels before they could reenter the river. Interior, however, had no jurustidction to regulate offshore (and generally non-Indian) commercial fishing, such jurisdiction resting with the Department of Commerce. Noting that Commerce and other involved agencies had not imposed effective limitations on offshore fishing (see 44 Fed. Reg. 17144, supra), Interior nonetheless was forced to impose the moratorium as the only available method to save the salmon population. In his concurring opinion in Eberhardt, Judge Beezer of the Ninth Circuit suggests an improvement in Commerce's regulation of offshore salmon fishing. (United States v. Eberhardt, supra, 789 F.2d at p. 1363 [conc. opn. of Beezer, J.].)

be decided against the "backdrop" of the unique status of Indian tribes under federal law and the traditional notions of Indian self-government. (Id., at p. 143; Three Affil. Tribes of Ft. Berthold v. Wold Engine, (1986) U.S. , 106 S.Ct. 2305, 2310.) "It must always be remembered that the various Indian tribes were once independent and sovereign nations, and that their claim to sovereignty long predates that of our own Government." (McClanahan v. Arizona State Tax Comm'n (1973) 411 U.S. 164, 172.) Having been assimilated only partially into American culture, the tribes retain a unique status of semi-independence, as a separate people no longer enjoying the full attributes of sovereignty but empowered to govern their own internal and social relations. (White Mountain Apache Tribe v. Bracker, supra, 448 U.S. at p. 142.)

The tribes' semi-independence is subject to the broad power of Congress to regulate Indian affairs under the Commerce Clause. (White Mountain Apache Tribe v. Bracker, supra, 448 U.S. at p. 142-143. See New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe (1983) 462 U.S. 324, 332-336; Ramah Navajo School Bd. v. Bureau of Revenue (1982) 458 U.S. 832, 837.) This federal regulatory power, plus the tribes' retention of quasi-sovereignty, pose two "independent but related barriers to the assertion of state regulatory authority" over Indian tribes. (White Mountain Apache Tribe v. Bracker, supra, 448 U.S. at p. 142; People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 525.) The United States Supreme Court has recently suggested that tribal sovereignty alone is insufficient to pre-empt state regulation, noting a "trend . . . away from the idea of inherent Indian sovereignty as a bar to state jurisdiction and toward reliance on federal pre-emption." (Three Affil. Tribes of Ft. Berthold v. Wold Engine. (1986) U.S. , 106 S.Ct. 2305, 2309, quoting Rice v. Rehner (1983) 463 U.S. 713, 718.)

Federal preemption applies in a "special sense" to state regulation of Indian affairs. New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe, supra, 462 U.S. at pp. 333-334.) The "unique historical origins of tribal sovereignty" has led the courts to eschew strict adherance to traditional preemption standards, and to focus instead on a "particularized inquiry into the nature of the state, federal and tribal interests at stake, . . . " White Mountain Apache Tribe v.

Bracker, supra, 448 U.S. at pp. 143, 145.) "State jurisdiction is pre-empted by the operation of federal law if it interferes or is incompatible with federal and tribal interests reflected in federal law, unless the state interests at stake are sufficient to justify the assertion of state authority." New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe, supra, 462 U.S. at p. 334.)

The preeption cases look to the nature of the federal regulatory scheme. If the scheme is "all-inclusive" or "comprehensive", state laws will be preempted if they "disturb or dissarange" the federal schemata. (Warren Trading Post v. Tax Comm'n (1965) 380 U.S. 685, 690-691.) This is particularly true if the federal regulations are the means of furthering a strong federal policy toward the Indians, such as the fostering of tribal self-government or economic or educational self-sufficiency. (See Ramah Navajo School Bd. v. Bureau of Revenue, supra, 458 U.S. at pp. 839, 846-847; White Mountain Apache Tribe v. Bracker, supra, 448 U.S. at pp. 148-149.)

Applying these principles, the United States Supreme Court has consistently preempted state attempts to regulate Indian economic affairs. In Warren Trading Post, the Court cited the comprehensiveness of federal regulation of Indian trading on reservations and held a state could not tax gross income on sales made to Indians by an on-reservation trading post. In Ramah Navajo School Bd., the Court held the comprehensive nature of the federal regulations, plus the policy of furthering educational self-sufficiency, prevented the state from taxing a non-Indian construction company's gross receipts from the construction of an Indian school. The court emphasized that "[f]ederal regulation of the construction and financing of Indian educational institutions is both comprehensive and pervasive." (458 U.S. 832, 839.) Imposition of the state tax on gross receipts was precluded by "the comprehensive federal regulatory scheme" and "the express federal policy of encouraging tribal self-sufficiency in the area of educatioin." (Id. at p. 846-847.)

Similarly, in White Mountain Apache Tribe v. Bracker, supra, the court held that a state could not impose motor carrier license and use fuel taxes on a non-Indian logging company for its on-reservation logging activities. The rationale for preempting state regulation of reservation logging mirrored that embraced in Ramah Navajo School Board: the federal regulatory scheme governing the harvesting and selling of Indian timber was pervasis, and state regulation would impede and disturb federal regulations and undermine the federal policy of encouraging the Indian tribes to "revitalize their self-government" and assert control over economic affairs. (448 U.S. at pp. 148-149.)

These decisions involve general questions of economic regulation and tribal self-sufficiency: not conservation of a precious and finite environmental resource and the state's significant interest in its regulations in furtherance of resource preservation. The first Indian preemption case to approach application of preemption principles in the environmental context was New Mexico v. Mescalero Apache Tribe, supra, and that case involved questions of general wildlife management rather than urgent questions of conserving a fixed resource of fragile survival potential.

In Mescalero, the state sought concurrent jurisdiction over tribal wildlife management. New Mexico wished to apply its extensive regulations of hunting and fishing, including licensing requirements, season definitions and bag limits, to hunting and fishing conducted on reservation land. Imposition of these state regulations severely impacted upon, and directly conflicted with, the Apache tribe's efforts to manage and develop its fish and wildlife resources in "a sustained, cooperative effort by the Tribe and the Federal Government." (462 U.S., at pp. 327-328.)

The Supreme Court held the state regulations were preempted for two major reasons. First, the imposition of state regulations would "disturb and disarrange" the federal/Indian joint resource management program. The tribal regulations "reflect[ed] the specific needs of the reservation by establishing the optimal level of hunting and fishing that should occur", based on a continuous series of fine-tuned, expert wildlife management decisions made by federal and Indian experts. (462 U.S. at p. 339; see id. at pp. 327-329.) State hunting and fishing laws would be "based on considerations not necessarily relevent to, and possibly hostile to, the needs of the reservation", a circumstance which "could severely hinder the ability of the Tribe to conduct a sound management program." (Id. at p. 339.) Examples cited by the court underscore that general wildlife management, not species-specific conservation, is the touchstone of the holding: for instance, the court observed the tribal regulation permitting a hunter to kill a buck and a doe "was designed to curb excessive growth of the deer population on the reservation," while the state regulation banning the killing of does would frustrate that resource management objective. (462 U.S. at p. 339.) In a similar vein, the tribe's determination of hunting seasons, bag limits and permit availability governed the "duration and intensity of hunting" based on numerous factors, including "the game capacity of the terrain, the range utilization of the range animals, and the availability of tribal personnel to monitor the hunts." (Ibid.)

Second, the Court stressed the tribe's exonomic dependence on its wildlife management scheme. "The assertion of concurrent jurisdiction by New Mexico . . . would threaten Congress' overriding objective of encouraging tribal self-government and economic development. The tribe has engaged in a concerted and sustained undertaking to develop and manage the reservation's wildlife and land resources specifically for the benefit of its members. The project generates funds for essential tribal services and provides employment for members who reside on the reservation. . . . The disruptive effect that would result from the assertion of concurrent jurisdiction . . . would plainly ' "stan[d] as an obstacle to the accomplishment of the full purposes and objectives of Congress." ' " (462 U.S. at p. 341, quoting Ramah Navajo School Bd. v. Bureau of Revenue, supra, 458 U.S. at p. 845.)

In summary, the tribal interests in Mescalero centered around the ongoing, complex Indian enterprise of managing all reservation fish and wildlife resources—resources renewing themselves by the processes of nature—primarily for the economic benefit of the tribe. The management enterprise did not concern protection of a threatened species subject to elimination from the environment. Indeed, the regulations reviewed in Mescalero are premised on the assumption of a natural continuation of the reservation's ecological bounty, and even in some cases required the control, as opposed to the conservation, species population. Certainly Mescalero did not involve a species, such as the Klamath River salmon at issue here, which are both threatened with critical impairment of population levels below a minimum necessary for species survival, and are taken by a "dragnet" fishing method at the spawning run, the very time the salmon are the most vulnerable to population impairment and at the greatest need for protection by conservation regulations. Indeed, the Mescalero decision expressly approved the concept of state concurrent jurisidiction for convervation purposes.

The Mescalero court acknowledged that a state could regulate the off-reservation impacts of reservation activity to preserve a "scarce, common supply" of a natural resource. The court concluded that New Mexico had failed to show any such effects, especially since "[s]ome species of game never leave tribal lands and the State points to no specific interest concerning those that occasionally do." (Id. at p. 342) Moreover, New Mexico in that case had conceded that the Indians' resource management "has not had an adverse impact on fish and wildlife outside the Reservation,' " (Ibid.)

In this case, the State of California does not make such a concession and contends that unregulated gill netting endangers the resource In addition, most of the fish do (and in fact, must) leave the reservation and are not solely within the confines of reservation autonomy. It is important that the limited portion of the Klamath River system which flows through the lower Hoopa Valley reservation and into the sea is merely a gateway through which all anadromous fish must pass on their way to their birthplace and spawning grounds. The Trinity, Salmon, Scott and Shasta Rivers, all with their own tributaries, empty into the Klamath River along with numerous upriver creeks containing spawning beds. Those are areas well outside the Del Norte County area in question here, and are protected and regulated by state law. Most significantly, many fish returning upstream are enroute to state hatcheries. Thus, if unregulated or uncontrolled gill netting is allowed to exist, not only will fish which have been reared and released into the river by state fish hatcheries and spawning beds on other state lands, and the species may soon become extinct in those streams.

Therefore, state regulation in this case would not be inconsistent with Mescalero because of the need to preserve an at-risk resource over which the Indians do not have exclusive dominion. "In a nonpreemption context, the [United States Supreme] [C]ourt has held that a state may, in the interest of conservation, regulate Indian fishing rights which were created by treaty." (People v. McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p. 532.) The most famous of these holdings are the "Puyallup trilogy": Puyallup Tribe v. Dept. of Game (1968) 391 U.S. 392 ["Puyallup I"]; Washington Game Dept. v. Puyallup Tribe (1973) 414 U.S. 44 ["Puyallup II"]; and Puyallup Tribe v. Washington Game Dept. (1977) 433 U.S. 165 ["Puyallup III"]. In the Puyallup cases no comprehensive federal regulatory scheme was in place. The Indians simply enjoyed treaty rights to fish in common with other citizens of the state. (Puyallup I, supra, 391 U.S. at p. 398; Puyallup II, supra, 414 U.S. at p. 45.) Like the fishing rights of non-Indians, the Indians' rights could be regulated under the auspices of the state's police power to preserve an endangered resource or to otherwise further conservation. (Puyallup I, supra, 391 U.S. at pp. 398- 400.)

When the resource at issue is an anodramous fish with a necessary escapement level essential to survival, conservation measures are especially significant. As the late Justice Douglas eloquently observed in Puyallup II: "We do not imply that [the Indians'] fishing rights persist down to the very last steelhead in the river. Rights can be controlled by the need to conserve a species; and the time may come when the life of a steelhead is so precarious in a particular stream that all fishing should be banned until the species regains assurance of survival. The police power of the State is adequate to prevent the steelhead from following the fate of the passenger pigeon; and the Treaty does not give the Indians a federal right to pursue the last living steelhead until it enters their nets." (414 U.S. at p. 49.)

III

We conclude that the State's concurrent jurisdiction over tribal salmon fishing in the Klamath River is not preempted by the federal regulations. We are of the view that McCovey does not directly apply to the case before us, for two reasons.

First, in the context of the conservation of a finite, threatened natural resource the state's regulatory ability is not static. The conservation of such a natural resource is sufficiently compelling to enable the state to assert a more powerful need for conservation. The People have presented clear indications that after McCovey was decided the Klamath River population continued to decline. The Bureau of Indian Affairs found that the salmon population was in greater jeopardy in 1985 than in 1979 when the moratorium was first imposed. In fact, the Bureau concluded—after McCovey was decided—that the spawning run was "in danger of being eliminated." McCovey, as as controlling precedent of the United States Supreme Court, does not preclude concurrent state jurisdiction over a precarious state resource. As the Ninth Circuit has recently ruled, a state may regulate Indian fishing if its regulation is reasonable and necessary for conservation. "Unlike Congress, states may not qualify Indian fishing rights. Puyallup Tribe v. Department of Game (Puyallup I), 391 U.S. 392, 398 (1968); [United States v.] Sohappy, 770 F2d [811] 823; [United States v.] Fryber, 622 F.2d [1010], 1014-15. However, states may regulate Indian rights in the interest of conservation by an appropriate exercise of their police power. State regulation for conservation purposes is based on the state's interest in protecting fish and wildlife resources for the benefit of its citizens. See Puyallup Tribe v. Department of Game (Puyallup III), 433 U.S. 165, 175-76 (1977); see also United States v. Michigan, 653 F.2d 277, 279 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1124 (1981). The violation of state conservation laws is a federal offense. 16 U.S.C. § 3372(a)(2) (1982); see Sohappy, 770 F.2d at 834-44. [¶] "A state must show that any regulation of Indian fishing rights is both reasonable and necessary for conservation purposes. Antoine v. Washington, 420 U.S. 194, 207 (1975); Sohappy, 770 F.2d at 823. State regulations meeting these standards may extend to the manner of fishing, the size of the take, and the restriction of commercial fishing. Puyallup I, 391 U.S. at 398. In the context of state regulation of Indian fishing rights, we have rejected the endangered species approach to conservation, finding that fishing limitations may be proper even though extinction is not imminent. United States v. Oregon, 718 F.2d 299, 305 (9th Cir. 1983); (United States v. Eberhardt, supra, 789 F.2d at

p. 1361-1362.) In light of the post-McCovey diminution of the salmon run to the point of imminent demise, we can easily distinguish the situation which now faces us from that before the California Supreme Court when it rendered its 1984 decision.

Second, and perhaps of greater significance, McCovey as well as Arnett, assumed the Klamath River salmon at issue therein were exclusively a Reservation resource. One may read its holding as limited solely to those fish resources which spawn in Reservation waters or which were stocked by Interior fisheries. In fact, however, the majority of Klamath River salmon run are a state resource, which has been substantially enhanced over the years by stocking efforts of the State Resource Agency at the Iron Gate Salmon and Steelhead Hatchery, located outside the Reservation boundary upstream from the Reservation. (See, e.g., State of California Resources Agency, Department of Fish and Game, Annual Report Iron Gate Salmon and Steelhead Hatcher 1983-1984, Administrative Report No. 85-01 (1985), of which we take judicial notice.)

McCovey did not hold that California's salmon and steelhead stock, added to the upstream Klamath waters through state fish hatcheries or other nonreservation spawning grounds, is to be governed by the same considerations as an exclusive Reservation resource such as the deer resource discussed in Mescalero. Neither McCovey nor Arnett held that the State could not protect its own fish from extinction. We therefore conclude that the anadromous fish traversing the Klamath River passage are not under the total dominion of the Yoruk tribe, and petitioners' gill netting may be regulated by the State of California in the interest of conservation, and the protection of its own fish.

Accordingly, the petition for writ of prohibition is denied.[4]

---

[4] Because of our disposition of this matter, we need not reach the People's remaining contentions. We reject as without merit the arguments of individual petitioners that the pending criminal charges are not supported by probable cause.

CERTIFIED FOR PUBLICATION

_____

HANING, J.

WE CONCUR:

_____

LOW, P.J.

_____

KING. J.

CERTIFIED FOR PUBLICATION

Appendix C

SUPERIOR COURT
OF THE
STATE OF CALIFORNIA
COUNTY OF DEL NORTE

Action No. 82-053-C

The People of the State of California,
Plaintiffs,

vs.

Dianne Mattz, Tina Whipple, Antone Folkins,
Kenneth Mattz, Darrell Moorehead,
Raymond Mattz, Andrew Whipple, Marvin Mattz, Franklin Moorehead & Gilberta Whipple,
Defendants.

[Filed August 26, 1983]

RULING

All defendants challenged the jurisdiction of the Court by way of motions to dismiss, and again in the P.C. 995 motions as to the charges.

The request by the Attorney General that the Court take judicial notice of preferred Exhibits One (1) through Nine (9), and Twelve (12) through Eighteen (18). Twenty-one (21), Twenty-three (23), and Thirty (30) is granted. The offer of the remaining Exhibits Ten (10), Eleven (11), Nineteen (19), Twenty (20), Twenty-two (22), Twenty-four (24), and Twenty-nine (29) is denied.

The preemption analysis did not control questions of the applicability of state law to Indians outside the reservation, People v. McCovey, 145 CA 3d 190.), and,

Indians going beyond reservation boundaries . . . have generally been held subject to non-discriminatory state law otherwise applicable to all citizens of the state absent express federal law to the contrary. (People v. McCovey, Supra 198.) The motions to dismiss are therefore denied.

Each of the defendants joined the challenge to the record under the provisions of P.C. 995 as to each of them, individually, and the Court having reviewed the record as to each defendant denies each of the motions.

The case is to be calendared for September 16, 1983 at 9:15 a.m. for setting.

DATED: August 26, 1983.

CHARLES M. THOMAS, JR.
Charles M. Thomas, Jr.
Judge of the Superior Court, Assigned

Appendix D

ORDER DENYING REHEARING

No. S002805

IN THE SUPREME COURT
OF THE
STATE OF CALIFORNIA

IN BANK

Mattz et al., Petitioners

v.

The Superior Court of the County of Del Norte, Respondent; People, Real Party in Interest

[Filed October 13, 1988]

Real Party in Interest's petition for rehearing DENIED.

Mosk, J. and Kaufman, J., are of the opinion the petition should be granted.

LUCAS
Chairman

No. 88-1128 (3)

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
FEB 1 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

In The

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,

Petitioner,

v.

ANTONE FOLKINS, ET AL.,

Respondents.

On Writ Of Certiorari To The California Supreme Court

AMICI CURIAE BRIEF OF STATES OF ALASKA, COLORADO, KANSAS, MONTANA, NEVADA, NORTH DAKOTA, OKLAHOMA, AND WYOMING IN SUPPORT OF PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

STATE OF ALASKA
GRACE BERGE SCHAIBLE*
Attorney General of Alaska
P. O. Box K
Juneau, Alaska 99811

STATE OF COLORADO
DUANE WOODARD
Attorney General of Colorado
Colorado Department of Law
1525 Sherman Street
Denver, Colorado 80203

STATE OF KANSAS
ROBERT T. STEPHAN
Attorney General of Kansas
Office of the Attorney General
2nd Floor
Kansas Judicial Center
Topeka, Kansas 66612-1597

STATE OF MONTANA
MARC RACICOT
Attorney General of Montana
215 North Sanders
Helena, Montana 59620-1401

STATE OF NEVADA
BRIAN MCKAY
Attorney General of Nevada
Capitol Complex
Carson City, Nevada 89710

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA
NICHOLAS J. SPAETH
Attorney General
of North Dakota
State Capitol
Bismarck, North Dakota 58505

STATE OF OKLAHOMA
ROBERT H. HENRY
Attorney General
of Oklahoma
112 State Capitol
Oklahoma City,
Oklahoma 73105

STATE OF WYOMING
JOSEPH B. MEYER
Attorney General of Wyoming
123 Capitol Building
Cheyenne, Wyoming 82002

* Counsel of Record

COCKLE LAW BRIEF PRINTING CO., (800) 225-6964
OR CALL COLLECT (402) 342-2831

20 pp

QUESTION PRESENTED

Whether the reserved rights doctrine, which holds that the United States impliedly reserves water rights for use on federal lands, should be expanded to authorize the reservation of Indian commercial fishing rights in a navigable river that belongs to all the people of California.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE 1

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT 2

ARGUMENT:

I. CONTRARY TO THE DECISION BELOW, THE RESERVED RIGHTS DOCTRINE IS A WATER RIGHTS DOCTRINE ONLY, AND DOES NOT AUTHORIZE THE RESERVATION OF FISHING RIGHTS. 3

A. The Reserved Rights Doctrine 3

B. The Equal Footing Doctrine. 7

II. THE EXECUTIVE ORDER CREATING THE INDIAN RESERVATION REAFFIRMS THAT CALIFORNIA HAS THE RIGHT TO REGULATE INDIAN COMMERCIAL FISHING AND THEREFORE THAT THE INDIANS DO NOT HAVE "RESERVED" FISHING RIGHTS 13

CONCLUSION 15

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Page

CASES

Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546 (1963)..... 3, 5, 6, 7

Board of Commissioners v. Seber, 318 U.S. 705 (1943) 7

Cappaert v. United States, 426 U.S. 128 (1976)....3, 4, 5, 13

Choctaw Nation v. Oklahoma, 397 U.S. 620 (1970) 10

Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U.S. 370 (1891) 8, 9

Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322 (1980) 10

Illinois Central R.R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U.S. 387 (1892) 8

Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U.S. 240 (1891).....9

Martin v. Waddell, 41 U.S. 367 (1841) 8

McCready v. Virginia, 94 U.S. 391 (1876) ... 9, 11, 14, 15

Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544 (1981) 10

People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517 (1984).....12

Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Mississippi, ___ U.S. ___, 108 S.Ct. 791 (1988).....8

Poafpybitty v. Skelly Oil Co., 390 U.S. 365 (1968).....7

Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. 212 (1845).....8

Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U.S. 1 (1894)..... 8, 9

Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385 (1948).....10

United States v. Holt State Bank, 270 U.S. 49 (1926) 10

United States v. Oregon, 295 U.S. 1 (1935)..... 8, 11

United States v. New Mexico, 438 U.S. 696 (1978) 2, 3, 4, 5, 6

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES–Continued

Page

United States v. Texas, 399 U.S. 707 (1950) 8, 11

Winters v. United States, 207 U.S. 564 (1908) 3, 7

FEDERAL ACTS, CODES, REGULATIONS
REPORTS AND STATUTES

9 Stat. 452 (1850) 11

General Allotment Act of 1887, 24 Stat. 388 7

1 Kappler, Indian Affairs: Laws and Treaties 815....11, 13

I Ops. Solicitor, U.S. Dept. of Interior, 1917-1974 (March 13, 1940)..... 11

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

This amici brief is filed under Rule 36.4 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which authorizes states to file amici briefs as of right with respect to matters in which they have an interest. The amici states have substantial amounts of federal reserved lands within their borders, and also have navigable waterways flowing within their borders that serve important state interests. Therefore, the amici states have a strong interest in questions concerning the scope of the reserved rights doctrine, which holds that the United States impliedly reserves water rights for use on federal reserved lands.

The California Supreme Court expanded the reserved rights doctrine beyond limits recognized by this Court. The Court held that the doctrine authorizes the reservation not only of water rights, but also of other kinds of rights – in this case, Indian commercial fishing rights in a navigable river that California has traditionally regulated and managed. In the view of the amici states, the reserved rights doctrine applies in the water rights context only, and does not authorize reservations of rights other than water rights. The doctrine's purpose is to allow the United States to acquire water rights with priority over competing water rights that arise under state law after the date of the reservation. Neither authority nor logic supports the view that the doctrine should be expanded to authorize reservations of other kinds of rights.

By expanding the reserved rights doctrine here, the California Supreme Court has substantially diminished state sovereign trust authority over navigable waters. The states' trust authority, as relevant here, authorizes state regulation of fish resources in navigable waters for the benefit of the whole community. In this case, the California Supreme Court abrogated the states' trust authority over their fish resources, holding that Indians on a reservation created during the post-statehood period have the exclusive right to commercially harvest a fish resource that migrates through navigable waters. It is doubtful if the states can properly exercise their trust authority if, as the California Supreme Court held, the states are unable to prevent the commercial exploitation of fish resources in navigable waters. Therefore, the states request that this Court grant the petition and reverse the decision below.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The reserved rights doctrine authorizes the United States to reserve water rights for use on federal reserved lands. The doctrine is a water rights doctrine only, and does not authorize the reservation of other kinds of rights. The California Supreme Court improperly expanded the reserved rights doctrine by holding that an executive order creating an Indian reservation during the post-statehood period impliedly "reserved" an exclusive right for the Indians to commercially fish in the river. The Court failed to consider whether federal, state and tribal interests warrant an expansion of the reserved rights doctrine to the commercial fishing context. Indeed, the Court did not even consider whether commercial fishing is a "primary" or "secondary" reservation purpose, as required by this Court's recent decision in United States v. New Mexico, 438 U.S. 696 (1978). The decision below conflicts with this Court's decisions restricting the reserved rights doctrine to the water rights context.

By expanding the reserved rights doctrine, the California Supreme Court has improperly limited the states' sovereign dominion and control of fish resources in navigable waters, as such dominion arises under the equal footing doctrine. This Court has consistently held that the states have sovereign dominion over fish resources in navigable waters, and therefore that the United States cannot convey proprietary rights in such resources during the post-statehood period. The decision below circumvents this limitation by holding that the United States impliedly "reserved" commercial fishing rights, in the sense that the United States "reserved" water rights in Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546 (1963). In effect, the California Supreme Court decision allows the United States to improperly "grant" proprietary rights by "reserving" them.

The ultimate question under the reserved rights doctrine is whether Congress "intended" to reserve water rights. The executive order creating the Indian reservation here specifically excluded the river from the reservation in recognition of California's sovereign dominion over its fish resource. Therefore, the "intent" of the executive order clearly was to preserve California's sovereign interests, rather than "reserve" exclusive Indian commercial fishing rights.

ARGUMENT

I. CONTRARY TO THE DECISION BELOW, THE RESERVED RIGHTS DOCTRINE IS A WATER RIGHTS DOCTRINE ONLY, AND DOES NOT AUTHORIZE RESERVATION OF FISHING RIGHTS.

A. The Reserved Rights Doctrine

Under the reserved rights doctrine, the United States has the right to reserve, and impliedly reserves, unappropriated water for use on federal reserved lands. Cappaert v. United States, 426 U.S. 128, 138-139 (1976); United States v. New Mexico, supra, 438 U.S. at 698; Arizona v. California, supra, 373 U.S. at 597-601; Winters v. United States, 207 U.S. 564 (1908). The California Supreme Court, relying on this Court's decision in Arizona v. California, supra, held that the reserved rights doctrine authorizes Indians on a reservation adjacent to a navigable river to commercially fish free of restrictions imposed by state law. App. 5-6. The Court's decision represents an unprecedented and unwarranted expansion of the reserved rights doctrine, and conflicts with this Court's decisions restricting the scope of the doctrine.

This Court has consistently held that the reserved rights doctrine is a water rights doctrine only. In Cappaert v. United States, supra, this Court stated that:

> "This Court has long held that when the Federal Government withdraws its land from the public domain and reserves it for a federal purpose, the Government, by implication, reserves appurtenant water then unappropriated to the extent needed to accomplish the purpose of the reservation. In so doing the United States acquires a reserved right in unappropriated water which vests on the date of the reservation and is superior to the rights of future appropriators. Reservation of water rights is empowered by the Commerce Clause, Art. I, § 8, which permits federal regulation of navigable streams, and the Property Clause, Art. IV, § 3, which permits federal regulation of federal lands. The doctrine applies to Indian reservations and other federal enclaves, encompassing water rights in navigable and nonnavigable streams. . . . Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 601 (1963); [other citations omitted]." 426 U.S. at 138 (emphasis added).

In United States v. New Mexico, supra, this Court stated that:

> "This Court has previously concluded that whatever powers the States acquired over their waters as a result of congressional Acts and admission into the Union, . . . Congress did not intend thereby to relinquish its authority to reserve unappropriated > water in the future for use on appurtenant lands withdrawn from the public domain for specific federal purposes." 438 U.S. at 698 (emphasis added).

In Arizona v. California, supra, the case on which the California Supreme Court relied, this Court stated that:

> "We have no doubt about the power of the United States under these clauses [the Commerce Clause and Property Clause] to reserve water rights for its reservation and its property." 373 U.S. at 598 (emphasis added).

Thus, Cappaert, New Mexico and Arizona explicitly hold that the reserved rights doctrine authorizes reservations only of "water rights." As this Court stated in New Mexico, the doctrine authorizes reservations only of "unappropriated water" for "use" on appurtenant reserved "lands." The purpose of the doctrine, according to these decisions, is to authorize the United States to acquire water rights under federal law for use on reserved lands, with a priority based on the date of the reservation. The doctrine has never been construed as authorizing reservations of other kinds of rights, and its logic and policy do not support such an expansion.

The California Supreme Court below reasoned that, because the United States impliedly reserves water rights for use on reserved lands, it necessarily reserves commercial fishing rights as well. Contrary to this assumption, this Court has carefully restricted the scope of the reserved rights doctrine in order to avoid undue interference with state sovereign interests under the equal footing doctrine. In United States v. New Mexico, supra, this Court held that the United States impliedly reserves water rights only for "primary" reservation purposes, and that the United States must acquire water rights for "secondary" reservation purposes under state law. Thus, this Court in New Mexico qualitatively considered federal and state interests – in terms of whether federal "primary" or "secondary" interests are involved – in order to limit federal intrusion on state sovereign interests. In light of New Mexico, the reserved rights doctrine cannot be applied, much less expanded, without determining whether discrete federal interests outweigh state sovereign interests under the equal footing doctrine. The California Supreme Court utterly failed to make such an inquiry. Indeed, since the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior in 1940 concluded that California law applies to Indian fishing in the Klamath River, Pet. 10, and since the Secretary of the Interior in 1974 adopted regulations prohibiting Indian commercial fishing in the Klamath River, Pet. 3 n. 2, it is difficult to conclude that any conceivable federal interest supports the reservation of Indian commercial fishing rights in this case.

Under this Court's decision in New Mexico, the threshhold inquiry in determining whether the reserved rights doctrine applies to a particular federal or tribal activity is whether the activity constitutes a "primary" or "secondary" reservation purpose. The California Supreme Court, applying Arizona v. California by analogy and ignoring New Mexico altogether, failed to consider whether commercial fishing is a "primary" or "secondary" reservation purpose. In other words, even assuming that the reserved rights doctrine should be expanded to the fishing context, the question remains whether commercial fishing is a primary or secondary reservation purpose. The California Supreme Court, in uncritically expanding the doctrine here, completely failed to make this essential inquiry.

The historic purpose of the reserved rights doctrine, as applied to Indian reservations, was to allow Indians to acquire water rights for development of land and thus encourage their assimilation into the mainstream of American civilization.[1] In Arizona v. California, supra, this Court held that the reserved rights doctrine, as applied to Indian reservations, authorizes the reservation of water only for "irrigation" uses, and that the reserved right is measured by the "practicably irrigable acreage" of the reservation. 373 U.S. at 597-598, 600 (emphasis added). Similarly, the General Allotment Act of 1887, 24 Stat. 388, which established federal reservation policy for nearly a half century – and which provided for the issuance of Indian trust allotments for agricultural and grazing purposes – established "a policy of assimilating the Indians through . . . the compulsory individualization of Indian lands;" Congress thus undertook "to prepare the Indians to take their place as independent, qualified members of the modern body politic." Board of Commissioners v. Seber, 318 U.S. 705, 716 (1943) (emphasis added); see Poafpybitty v. Skelly Oil Co., 390 U.S. 365, 369 (1968). Thus, Congress' historic reservation policy, as interpreted by this Court, has been to encourage the development of Indian land. This policy is not consistent with reservations of commercial rights in fish resources that belong to all the people.

B. The Equal Footing Doctrine

As noted above, this Court has restricted the scope of the reserved rights doctrine in order to limit federal intrusion into areas traditionally regulated by the states

---

[1] In Winters v. United States, supra, where the reserved rights doctrine was initially applied to Indian reservations, this Court stated that the Indians' "lands were arid, and, without irrigation, were practically valueless;" it cannot be imagined, the Court stated, that Congress meant to leave the Indians with a "barren waste – took from them the means of continuing their old habits, yet did not leave them the power to change to new ones." 207 U.S. at 576, 577.

under the equal footing or public trust doctrine.[2] Under the equal footing doctrine, each state acquires dominion and sovereignty over its navigable waters – including fish resources in the waters – at the time of its admission to the Union. Martin v. Waddell, 41 U.S. 367, 410 (1841); Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U.S. 1, 14-15, 26, 48 (1894); Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U.S. 370, 381 ((1891); Illinois Central R.R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U.S. 387, 435-437 (1892); United States v. Oregon, 295 U.S. 1, 14 (1935); United States v. Texas, 339 U.S. 707, 717 (1950). In Martin v. Waddell, supra, this Court stated that:

> "For when the revolution took place, the people of each state themselves became sovereign; and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the constitution to the general government." 41 U.S. at 410.

In Illinois Central, this Court explained the nature of the states' sovereign interests more fully, stating that:

> "[T]he State holds the title to the lands under the navigable waters . . . in the same manner that the State holds title to soils under tide water, by the common law, . . . But it is a title different in character from that which the State holds in lands intended for sale. . . . It is a title held in trust for the people of the State that they may enjoy the navigation of the > waters, carry on commerce over them, and have liberty of fishing therein freed from the obstruction or interference of private parties." 146 U.S. at 452.

---

[2] This Court has traditionally used the "equal footing" nomenclature in describing the source of the states' sovereign interests in navigable waters. See, e.g., Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. 212, 223 (1845). In Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Mississippi, ___U.S. ___, 108 S.Ct. 791 (1988), this Court used the "public trust" nomenclature for this purpose, apparently because the former applies only to newly-admitted states and the latter applies to the original thirteen states as well.

This Court has explicitly held that the states' sovereign dominion and sovereignty over navigable waters extends to fish resources in the waters, and that the states hold their fish resources in trust for the public. McCready v. Virginia, 94 U.S. 391, 394-395 (1876); Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U.S. 240, 259-262 (1891); Shively v. Bowlby, supra, 152 U.S. at 11; Hardin v. Jordan, supra, 140 U.S. at 381. In McCready, this Court stated that:

> "The principle has long been settled in this court, that each State owns the beds of all tide-waters within its jurisdiction, unless they have been granted away. [Citations omitted.] In like manner, the States own the tide-waters themselves, and the fish in them, so long as they are capable of ownership while running. . . . The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which . . . has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the State, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tide-waters and their beds to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish, so far as it may be done without obstructing navigation. . . . The right which the people of the State thus acquire comes not from their citizenship alone, but from their citizenship and property combined. It is, in fact, a property right, and not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship." 94 U.S. at 395 (emphasis added).

In the same vein, this Court stated in Hardin that:

> "With regard to grants of the government for lands bordering on tide water, it has been distinctly settled that they only extend to high-water mark, and that the title to the shore and lands under water in front of lands so granted enures to the State within which > they are situated . . . Such title to the shore and lands under water is regarded as incidental to the sovereignty of the State – a portion of the royalties belonging thereto and held in trust for the public purposes of navigation and fishery – and cannot be retained or granted out to individuals by the United States." 140 U.S. at 381 (emphasis added).

To be sure, the states cannot regulate their fish resources in a discriminatory manner. Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322 (1980); Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385 (1948). California's regulation in this case, however, applies equally to everyone, both Indians and non-Indians.

This Court has imposed a significant limitation on state sovereign interests under the equal footing doctrine. This Court has held that the United States, as the absolute owner of navigable waters and fish resources during the pre-statehood period, has the right to convey proprietary rights in the waters and resources during that period. United States v. Holt State Bank, 270 U.S. 49, 54-55 (1926); Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544, 551-552 (1981); Choctaw Nation v. Oklahoma, 397 U.S. 620 (1970). This Court, however, has narrowly construed such conveyances in order to protect the states' sovereign interests, stating that:

> " 'Dominion over navigable waters and property in the soil under them are so identified with the sovereign power of government that a presumption against their separation from sovereignty must be indulged, in construing either grants by the sovereign of the lands to be held in private ownership or transfer of sovereignty itself. [Citation omitted.] For that reason, upon the admission of a State to the Union, the title of the United States to lands underlying navigable waters within the States passes to it, as incident to the transfer to the State of local sovereignty, and is subject only to the paramount power of the United States to control such waters for purposes of navigation in interstate or foreign commerce.' "

United States v. Texas, supra, 339 U.S. at 717, quoting from United States v. Oregon, supra, 295 U.S. at 14.

In this case, the United States did not convey Indian fishing rights prior to California's admission to statehood. California was admitted to the Union in 1850. 9 Stat. 452. The Indian reservation was not created until 1891. 1 Kappler, Indian Affairs: Laws and Treaties 815 (emphasis added). Therefore, the Indian reservation was created after California's admission to the Union. Accordingly, the United States could not have granted Indian fishing rights in this case during the post-statehood period, even assuming arguendo that the executive order creating the reservation can be construed as conveying such rights. The California Supreme Court improperly construed a post-statehood executive order as reserving Indian fishing rights, although such rights could not have been directly granted during the post-statehood period. In the view of the amici states, the United States cannot indirectly accomplish under its reserved rights authority what cannot be directly accomplished under its authority to grant proprietary rights in navigable waters.

The United States itself has expressed the view that the Indians on the reservation in this case do not have "reserved" fishing rights and thus cannot fish in violation of California law. According to an opinion of the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior, issued in 1940, the State of California has the right to regulate Indian fishing in the Klamath River if the river was navigable at the time of California's admission to the Union. I Ops. Solicitor, U.S. Dept. of Interior, 1917-1974, at 945-948 (March 13, 1940); Pet. 14. In effect, the Solicitor followed this Court's decision in McCready v. Virginia by holding that California has the sovereign right to regulate the very fish resource involved in this case, and that the United States has not "reserved" – and cannot reserve – exclusive fishing rights for the Indians. The California Supreme Court reached the contrary result without considering or even mentioning the Solicitor's opinion.[3]

---

[3] The petition for writ of certiorari notes that the Secretary of the Interior adopted regulations in 1977 that, according to the California Supreme Court's earlier decision in People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517 (1984), preempt California laws applicable to Indian commercial fishing in the Klamath River. Pet. 3 n. 2. The petition properly notes, however, that the Secretary would lack authority to adopt regulations that preempt California law if the Indians do not have "reserved" fishing rights, since in that event California would have the sovereign right to regulate the fish resource under the equal footing doctrine. Pet. 3 n. 2, 6-7 n. 5. That is, if California has sovereign title to the resource under the equal footing doctrine, and if the Indians do not have "reserved" fishing rights that limit California's sovereign title, the Secretary cannot unilaterally abridge California's sovereign title by adopting preemptive regulations. The California Supreme Court did not appear to conclude otherwise.

In the view of the amici states, the Secretary's regulations should be construed in light of the Solicitor's 1940 opinion, which, as noted above, declared that California has sovereign title to the fish resource and therefore that the Indians do not have "reserved" fishing rights. So construed, it is unlikely that the Secretary's regulations were intended to preempt California laws. That is, if the Solicitor concluded in 1940 that California has the sovereign right to regulate Indian fishing in the Klamath River, the Secretary's 1974 regulations logically cannot be construed as preempting California law. This conclusion is buttressed by the fact that the Secretary's 1974 regulations are harmonious with California law, in that the regulations – similarly to California law – prohibited Indian commercial fishing at the time of the actionable conduct in this case.

II. THE EXECUTIVE ORDER CREATING THE INDIAN RESERVATION REAFFIRMS THAT CALIFORNIA HAS THE RIGHT TO REGULATE INDIAN COMMERCIAL FISHING AND THEREFORE THAT THE INDIANS DO NOT HAVE "RESERVED" FISHING RIGHTS.

This Court has consistently emphasized that the reserved rights doctrine is based on congressional intent. According to this Court:

> "In determining whether there is a federally reserved water right implicit in a federal reservation of public land, the issue is whether the government intended to reserve unappropriated and thus available water. Intent is inferred if the previously unappropriated waters are necessary to accomplish the purposes for which the reservation was created. [Citations omitted.]" Cappaert v. United States, supra, 426 U.S. at 139 (emphasis added).

Therefore, if Congress intends that state law be followed, reserved rights cannot be inferred. The ultimate question is one of congressional intent.

The executive order creating the Indian reservation in this case, viewed in light of its language and surrounding historical circumstances, plainly evinces an "intent" not to reserve Indian fishing rights. The executive order specifically provided that the reservation includes only a "tract of country . . . one mile in width on each side of the Klamath River." 1 Kappler, Indian Affairs: Laws and Treaties 815 (emphasis added). This limitation was inserted because the United States Attorney General, in a written opinion, stated that California had sovereign dominion and control over the Klamath River, and that the Secretary of the Interior – who proposed to create the reservation – could not include the river itself in the reservation. The Attorney General opinion stated that:

> "In the case of McCready v. Virginia (94 U.S., 391, 394) the Supreme Court says: . . . 'In like manner the States own the tide-waters themselves and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running. For this purpose the State represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty. (Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet., 410) The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the State, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tidewaters and their beds, to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish, so far as it may be done without obstructing navigation.' " S. Exec. Doc. No. 140, at 13-14, 50th Cong., 2d Sess. (1887); Pet. 20.

Thus, the executive order, read in light of the Attorney General opinion, plainly excluded the Klamath River from the Indian reservation in recognition of California's sovereign interests in the river. The "intent" of the executive order was to allow California to exercise its sovereign trust over the resource, not to "reserve" Indian fishing rights that are beyond the reach of California law.

Significantly, the executive order relied on this Court's decision in McCready v. Virginia, which holds that the State has "exclusive control" of fish resources in navigable waters. As noted earlier, the Interior Solicitor also relied on this Court's decision in McCready in concluding that California has the sovereign right to regulate Indian fishing in the Klamath River. In other words, this Court in McCready held that states have the sovereign right to regulate fish resources in navigable waters; the President in 1891 relied on McCready in issuing the executive order that preserved California's sovereign interests in the Klamath River fish resource; and the Interior Solicitor in 1940 relied on McCready in holding that California has the right to regulate Indian fishing in the river. The California Supreme Court decision not only flies in the face of this Court's decision in McCready, but also disregards the President's intent in creating the reservation and the Solicitor's opinion in construing Indian fishing rights in this case.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, it is respectfully requested that this Court grant the petition for writ of certiorari.

Respectfully submitted,

STATE OF ALASKA
GRACE BERGE SCHAIBLE*
Attorney General of Alaska

STATE OF COLORADO
DUANE WOODARD
Attorney General of Colorado

STATE OF KANSAS
ROBERT T. STEPHAN
Attorney General of Kansas

STATE OF MONTANA
MARC RACICOT
Attorney General of Montana

STATE OF NEVADA
BRIAN MCKAY
Attorney General of Nevada

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA
NICHOLAS J. SPAETH
Attorney General
of North Dakota

STATE OF OKLAHOMA
ROBERT H. HENRY
Attorney General
of Oklahoma

STATE OF WYOMING
JOSEPH B. MEYER
Attorney General of Wyoming

*Counsel of Record

(4)

No. 88-1128

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
FEB 16 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,

Petitioner,

vs.

ANTONE FOLKINS, et al.,

Respondents.

On Writ of Certiorari to the California Supreme Court

OPPOSITION OF KENNETH MATTZ TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

ALEXANDER & KARSHMER
GEORGE FORMAN
Counsel of Record
1900 Addison Street
Suite 200
Berkeley, California 94704
(415) 841-5056
Attorneys for Respondent
Kenneth Mattz

78p

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Page

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES iii

OPINIONS BELOW 1

APPLICABLE FEDERAL LAWS 1

RESPONSE TO PETITIONER'S STATEMENT OF THE CASE 10

ARGUMENT 25

I. THE PETITION SHOULD BE DENIED BECAUSE IT IS UNTIMELY. 25

II. GRANTING THE PETITION IS NEITHER NECESSARY NOR APPROPRIATE 32

A. The California Supreme Court Correctly Held that Petitioner is Barred by the Doctrine of Res Judicata/Collateral Estoppel from Relitigating the Existence of the Federally-Reserved Fishing Rights of the Indians of the Reservation. 32

B. The California Supreme Court Correctly Rejected on the Merits Petitioner's Argument that the "Equal Footing Doctrine" Precludes the Existence of the Fishing Rights of the

Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation. 39

C. The Circumstances Surrounding the Creation of the Reservation Indicate that the Reservation Includes the Klamath River. 46

CONCLUSION 49

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Page

Cases

Alaska Pacific Fisheries v. United States, 248 U.S. 78 (1918) 44

Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90 (1980) . . 38

Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 598 (1963), decree entered, 376 U.S. 340 (1964), modified, 439 U.S. 419 (1979), further modified, 460 U.S. 605 (1983) . . 43, 44, 49

Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, 48 Cal.App.3d 454, cert. den. 425 U.S. 907 (1974) . 11, 13, 14, 31, 35, 48

Bernhard v. Bank of America, 19 Cal.2d 807 (1942) 38

Blake v. Arnett, 663 F.2d 906 (9th Cir. 1981) 13, 16, 31, 35, 40, 47

Buck v. Superior Court, 245 Cal.App.2d 431 (1966) 17, 18, 28

Camfield v. United States, 167 U.S. 518 (1867) 41

Department of Game v. Puyallup Tribe (Puyallup II), 414 U.S. 44 (1973) . . 14

Donahue v. Justice Court, 15 Cal.App.3d 557 (1971) 30, 31, 36

Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 213, reh. den., 228 U.S. 708 (1913) . 16, 31, 36, 37, 47

Douglas v. Seacost Products, Inc., 431 U.S. 265, 284 (1977) 45

Elser v. Gill Net No. 1, 246 Cal.App.2d 30 (1966) 11, 30, 36

Heflin v. United States, 358 U.S. 415, 416 (n.7) (1959) 29

Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322 (1980) . 41, 45

In re Torres, 128 Cal.App.3d 826 (1982) . 28

Kleppe v. New Mexico, 426 U.S. 529 (1976) 41

Mattz v. Arnett, 412 U.S. 481 (1973) . . 12, 31, 38, 48

McGoldrick v. Compagnie Gen. Transatlantique, 309 U.S. 430 (1939) 18

Menominee Tribe v. United States, 391 U.S. 404 (1968) 43

Mesaris v. Superior Court, 4 Cal.App.3d 976 (1970) 16, 18, 28

Minnesota v. Block, 660 F.2d 1240 (8th cir., 1981), cert. den., 455 U.S. 1007 . 41, 44

Montana v. United States (1981) 450 U.S. 544 47

Morton v. Mancari, 417 U.S. 535, 555 (1974) 42

New England Power Co. v. New Hampshire, 455 U.S. 331 (1982) 44

Pacific Coast Federation of Fishermen's Ass'n. v. Sect'y. of Commerce, 494 F.Supp. 626 (N.D. Calif. 1980) . 13, 31, 35, 48

Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. of Calif. v. McConnell, 44 Cal.App.2d 715 (1955) . 39

People v. Crudginton, 88 Cal.App.3d 295 (1979) 17

People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517, cert. den. 469 U.S. 1062 (1984), S.Ct. No. 84-453 . . . . 9, 10, 12-14, 20, 21, 27, 31, 34-37, 39

People v. McCovey, 145 Cal.App.3d 190 (1984) 27

People v. McKee, 267 Cal.App.2d 509 (1969) 17, 18, 29

People v. Taylor, 250 Cal.App.2d 367 (1967) 17, 18, 29

Santa Rosa Band of Indians v. Kings County, 532 F.2d 655 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. den. 429 U.S. 1038 31

Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 402 (1948) 45

U.S. v. North Dakota, 650 F.2d 911 (8th Cir. 1981); affirmed, 458 U.S. 1129 (1983) 43

United States v. Brown, 552 F.2d 817 (8th Cir. 1977), cert. den., 431 U.S. 949 . . 42, 44

United States v. Eberhardt, 789 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986) 13, 31, 35, 36

United States v. Hells Canyon Guide Service, Inc., 660 F.2d 735 (9th Cir. 1981) 44

United States v. Holliday, 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 407 (1865) 41

United States v. Kagama, 117 U.S. 375 (1986) 41, 46

United States v. Lindsey, 595 F.2d 5 (9th Cir. 1979) 42, 44

United States v. San Francisco, 310 U.S. 16 (1940) 42

United States v. Wilson, 611 F.Supp. 813 (N.D. Calif. 1985) 34

Vanguard Recording Society v. Fantasy Records, Inc. 24 Cal.App.3d 410 (1972) . 39

Washington v. Fishing Vessels Ass'n., 443 U.S. 658 (1979) 44

Statutes, Regulations and Constitution

16 U.S.C. §3372(a)k 23

18 U.S.C. §1182 12

25 C.F.R. Part 250 23

28 U.S.C. §1360 12

28 U.S.C. §2101(c) 25

42 Fed.Reg. 40904-5 (Aug. 12, 1977) . 13

43 Fed.Reg. 30047-53 (July 13, 1978) . . 13

44 Fed.Reg. 17144-17151 (March 20, 1979) 13

46 Fed.Reg. 56057-8 (Nov. 13, 1981) . 14

52 Fed.Reg. 27329-35 (July 16, 1987) . . 14, 23

Act of April 13, 1864 (13 Stat. 39) . . 5

Act of March 3, 1852 (10 Stat. 3) . . . 1

Act of March 3, 1855 (10 Stat. 699) . . 3

California Penal Code §871.5 27

California Penal Code §999a . . . 28, 29

Executive Order of June 23, 1876 . . . 8

Executive Order of November 16, 1855 . 5

Executive Order of October 16, 1891 . . 1

Supreme Court Rule 20.1 . . . . . 25, 29

United States Constitution, Article VI, Cl. 2 . . . . . 12, 43

United States Constitution, Article I, §8, Cl. 3 41

United States Constitution, Article IV, §3, Cl. 2 41

No. 88-1128

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE

UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,

Petitioner,

vs.

ANTONE FOLKINS, et al.,

Respondents.

On Writ of Certiorari to the California Supreme Court

OPPOSITION OF KENNETH MATTZ TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

OPPOSITION OF KENNETH MATTZ TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

OPINIONS BELOW

The Petition omitted the decision of the committing magistrate granting Respondents' motion to dismiss at the conclusion of the preliminary hearing. That decision is reprinted as Appendix A, p. A-1.

APPLICABLE FEDERAL LAWS

The Petition lists only the Presidential Executive Order of October 16, 1891, as the federal law applicable to this case. In fact, the portions of the following federal statutes and Executive Orders quoted below also are applicable:

Act of March 3, 1852 (10 Stat. 3):

> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sixth section of an act approved May sixth, eighteen hundred and twenty-two, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, approved the thirtieth March, eighteen hundred and two;" also, the fifth section of an act approved May twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and twenty-four, entitled "An act to enable the President to hold treaties with certain Indian tribes, and for other purposes," be and the same hereby are revived, and extended to the State of California, for the purpose of establishing a superintendency of Indian affairs for said State, and that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be, and he hereby is authorized to appoint a superintendent of Indian Affairs to reside in said State, who shall possess the same powers, and be subject to the same duties within his superintendency as belong to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, with the power also of exercising administrative examination over all claims, and accounts and vouchers for disbursements, connected with Indian affairs in the said State of California, which shall be transmitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for final adjudication, and by him passed to the proper accounting officers of the treasury for settlement.

* * *

Act of March 3, 1855 (10 Stat. 699):

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and they hereby are, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes.

* * *

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in California, embracing expenses of travel of the superintendent and agents, twenty-eight thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars;

For the pay of physicians, smith, carpenters, and agricultural and mechanical laborers, on the reservations in California, fifty-four thousand three hundred dollars;

For defraying the expenses of the removal and subsistence of Indians in California, to three military reservations, in accordance with the plan submitted by the superintendent of Indian affairs of that State, and approved by the President, one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. Provided, That the superintendent of Indian affairs in that State be authorized, should he deem it expedient, to expend an amount not exceeding twenty thousand dollars of the sum herein appropriated, to relieve the temporary wants of the Indians outside of the reservations;

* * *

For collecting, removing, and subsisting the Indians of California (as provided by law,) on two additional military reservations, to be selected as heretofore, and not to contain exceeding twenty-five thousand acres each, in or near the State of California, the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars: Provided, That the President may enlarge the quantity of reservations heretofore selected, equal to those hereby provided for, and shall not expend the amount herein appropriated unless, in his opinion, the same shall be expedient; and the last proviso to the authority for five military reservations in California, per act of third of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That so much of the act approved on the thirty-first day of July last, as required that no more than twenty thousand dollars shall be drawn by the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, or in his hands expended at one and the same time, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Executive Order of November 16, 1855:

Let the reservation be made, as proposed.

Act of April 13, 1864 (13 Stat. 39):

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of April, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-four, the state of California shall, for Indian purposes, constitute one superintendency, for which there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a superintendent of Indian affairs for said superintendency, at a salary of three thousand six hundred dollars per annum, who shall reside at a point within said state, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, and who, upon executing a bond, upon such terms and such sum as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and taking the usual oath of office, shall have under his control and management, in like manner and subject to like rules and regulations as are prescribed for superintendents of other superintendencies, the Indians and Indian reservations that are or may hereafter be established in said state: Provided, That the superintendent shall be authorized to appoint a clerk, at a compensation not to exceed eighteen hundred dollars per annum.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be set apart by the President, and at his discretion, not exceeding four tracts of land, within the limits of said state, to be retained by the United States for the purposes of Indian reservations, which shall be of suitable extent for the accommodation of the Indians of said state, and shall be located as remote from white settlements as may be found practicable, having due regard to their adaptation to the purposes for which they are intended: Provided, That at least one of said tracts shall be located in what has heretofore been known as the northern district: And provided, further, That if it shall be found impracticable to establish the reservations herein contemplated without embracing improvements made within their limits by white persons lawfully there, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to contract for the purchase of such improvements, at a price not exceeding a fair valuation thereof, to be made under his direction. But no such contract shall be valid, nor any money paid thereon, until, upon a report of said contract and of said valuation to Congress, the same shall be approved and the money appropriated by law for that purpose: And provided, further, That said tracts to be set apart as aforesaid may, or may not, as in the discretion of the President may be deemed for the best interests of the Indians to be provided for, include any of the Indian reservations heretofore set apart in said state, and that in case any such reservation is so included, the same may be enlarged to such an extent as in the opinion of the President may be necessary, in order to its complete adaption to the purposes for which it is intended.

* * *

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an Indian agent for each of the reservations which shall be established under the provisions of this act, which said agent shall reside upon the reservation for which he shall be appointed, and shall discharge all the duties now or hereafter to be required of Indian agents by law, or by rules and regulations adopted, or to be adopted, for the regulation of the Indian service, so far as the same may be applicable. Each of the agents appointed as aforesaid shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, give bond in such penalties and with such conditions and such security as the President or Secretary of the Interior may require, and shall hold his office for the term of four years, unless sooner removed by the President, and shall receive an annual salary at the rate of eighteen hundred dollars.

* * *

Executive Order of June 23, 1876:

> It is hereby ordered that the south and west boundaries and that portion of the north boundary west of Trinity River surveyed, in 1875, by C. T. Bissel, and the courses and distances of the east boundary, and that portion of the north boundary east of Trinity River reported but not surveyed by him, viz: "Beginning at the southeast corner of the reservation at a post set in mound of rocks, marked 'H.V.R., No.3'; thence south 17-1/2 degrees west, 905.15 chains, to southeast corner of reservation; thence south 72-1/2 degrees west, 480 chains, to the mouth of Trinity River," be, and hereby are, declared to be the exterior boundaries of Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation, and the land embraced therein, an area of 89,572.43 acres, be, and hereby is, withdrawn from public sale, and set apart for Indian purposes, as one of the Indian reservations authorized to be set apart, in California, by act of Congress approved April 8, 1864. (13 Stats., p. 39.)

Petitioner omitted these same federal statutes and Executive Orders from the Petition in People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517, cert. den. 469 U.S. 1062

(1984), S.Ct. No. 84-453, which involved exactly the same issue as does this case.

RESPONSE TO PETITIONER'S STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The California Supreme Court's opinion accurately describes the case and the proceedings below at Petition, p. A-2-4, and Respondent adopts that statement as his own. However, because Petitioner's Statement of the Case is so misleading and inaccurate in its portrayal of the actual issue presented, and so distorts both the proceedings below and the record properly before the Court, a response to the most egregiously erroneous or deceptive portions of that Statement is necessary.1/

1/ The Petition in People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517, cert. den. 469 U.S. 1062 (1984) also was rife with misleading, partly-true and untrue statements.

The first portion of Petitioner's Statement of the Case which requires a response is the assertion in the first paragraph (Petition, p. 2) that,

> This case presents a long-standing controversy concerning the State of California's jurisdiction to regulate Indian commercial fishing in the lower Klamath River, a navigable waterway that the State of California holds in trust for all of its citizens.

Each element of the quoted sentence is fundamentally erroneous.

The first fundamental error is that the "controversy" described by Petitioner no longer exists except in the mind of counsel for Petitioner, having been long since resolved by prior decisions of the courts of California and this Court. Beginning with Elser v. Gill Net No. 1, 246 Cal.App.2d 30 (1966), continuing with Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, 48 Cal.App.3d 454, cert. den. 425 U.S. 907 (1974),[2/] and culminating with People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517, cert. den. 469 U.S. 1062 (1984), the courts of California have determined that the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation ("Reservation") includes the Klamath River, that the Indians of the Reservation have federally-protected rights to fish in the Klamath River and other Reservation waters, and that California has no jurisdiction to dictate to the Indians of the Reservation how, where or when they may fish, how many fish they may catch, or where or for what purpose(s) they may possess or dispose of fish caught in Reservation waters.

---

2/ Pursuant to this Court's directive in Mattz v. Arnett, 412 U.S. 481 (1973) the California Court of Appeal specifically determined that the creation of the Reservation by Executive Orders issued pursuant to statutes authorizing the creation of Reservations for "Indian purposes" reserved fishing rights to the Indians of the Reservation, that California's jurisdiction to regulate the exercise of these rights was precluded by the Supremacy Clause, U.S. Const. Art. VI, Cl. 2, and Public Law 83-280 (18 U.S.C. §1182, 28 U.S.C. §1360).

This Court denied petitions for writ(s) of certiorari in both Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets and People v. McCovey. The decisions in those cases are fully consistent with recent federal court decisions which have considered the same issues, see, e.g., Blake v. Arnett, 663 F.2d 906 (9th Cir. 1981), Pacific Coast Federation of Fishermen's Ass'n. v. Sect'y. of Commerce, 494 F.Supp. 626 (N.D. Calif. 1980), United States v. Eberhardt, 789 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986), and with the official positions of the Secretary of the Interior and the Solicitor General. See, e.g., 42 Fed.Reg. 40904-5 (Aug. 12, 1977); 43 Fed.Reg. 30047-53 (July 13, 1978); 44 Fed.Reg.

17144-17151 (March 20, 1979); 46 Fed.Reg. 56057-8 (Nov. 13, 1981); 52 Fed.Reg. 27329-35 (July 16, 1987); Brief of the United States in this Court in Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, supra, a true copy of which is included as Appendix B hereto, p. A-9. The second fundamental error is that Petitioner would divide the rights at issue in this case into "commercial" and "non-commercial" components. Neither the courts of California nor this Court ever have conditioned the existence of an Indian right to fish upon the use to which the Indians intend to put the fish they catch. See, e.g., Arnett, supra; McCovey, supra; Department of Game v. Puyallup Tribe (Puyallup II), 414 U.S. 44 (1973).

Compounding this second error, Petitioner's attack on the California Supreme Court's judgment is not limited to "commercial" fishing rights. Rather, Petitioner's repeated use of the term "commercial" fishing rights is nothing more than a smokescreen to conceal Petitioner's actual objective:

> The People maintain (1) that, notwithstanding [People v.] McCovey [36 Cal.3d 517, cert. den. 469 U.S. 1062 (1984)] and numerous other state and federal decisions, the Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation in fact do not possess any federally reserved fishing rights in the Klamath River at all and (2) that the federal government lacked the constitutional authority to establish the regulations over Hoopa Valley Reservation fishing which this Court found preemptive in McCovey. [Emph. in original.]

Mattz v. Superior Court, Petition, p. A-17. In other words, the sole object of this Petition is to deprive the Indians of the Reservation of the right to fish in the Klamath River for any purpose -- a right which is "not much less necessary to the existence of the Indians than the atmosphere they breathed." Blake v. Arnett, 663 F.2d 906, 909 (9th Cir. 1981).

The final fundamental error of the first sentence of Petitioner's Statement of the Case is that despite numerous opportunities to have done so, Petitioner never has properly put into issue the factual question whether any or all of the Klamath River between the Pacific Ocean and the Trinity River was navigable in 1850. Thus, the documentary "evidence" of which Petitioner sought judicial notice could not have been considered in any event.[3/] Mesaris v. Superior Court, 4 Cal.App.3d 976 (1970);

3/ Petitioner's attempt to have the Court take judicial notice of the navigability of any portion of the Klamath River is precluded by this Court's decision in Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 213, reh. den., 228 U.S. 708 (1913).

Buck v. Superior Court, 245 Cal.App.2d 431 (1966); People v. McKee, 267 Cal.App.2d 509 (1969); People v. Taylor, 250 Cal.App.2d 367 (1967); People v. Crudginton (1979) 88 Cal.App.3d 295.

Indeed, to grant the Petition herein, this Court would have to reject the factual determinations of both the California Court of Appeal and the California Supreme Court that,

> The evidence presented at the preliminary hearing established that defendants are Yurok Indians of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation and that the charged offenses involved fish caught within the boundaries of the reservation. [Emph. added.]
>
> Petition, p. A-2. See also, Petition, P. A-32.

To do so would be inconsistent with the existing record and factual findings of the lower courts, a result which is inconsistent with both this Court's practice, McGoldrick v. Compagnie Gen. Transatlantique, 309 U.S. 430 (1939), and California law. Buck v. Superior Court, supra, Mesaris v. Superior Court, supra, People v. McKee, supra, People v. Taylor, supra.

Petitioner's Statement of the Case contains numerous other serious errors and outright misstatements. For example, Petitioner repeatedly asserts (Petition, pp. 5, 8 and 22) that the California Supreme Court "held" or "acknowledged" that "historical circumstances" indicate that California acquired title to the bed of the Klamath River upon its entry into the Union. This is blatantly untrue.

An examination of both the California Supreme Court's actual language (Petition, p. A-20) and the context in which it was used discloses that the California Supreme Court did not "hold" or "acknowledge" that California actually acquired title to the riverbed in 1850. Rather, the California Supreme Court merely observed that the various documents of which Petitioner belatedly had requested judicial notice, and to which Respondents vehemently objected, > go no further than to indicate that the state, upon entry into the union, acquired title to the river bed of the Klamath River and its resources; they do not state, nor imply, that the federal government, in extending the Hoopa Valley Reservation to include the old Klamath River Reservation, did not intend to protect the Indians' traditional fishing rights in the river.4/

A glaring example of an outright falsehood is Petitioner's claim (made

---

4/ The Court of Appeal did not reach -- or even specifically mention -- Petitioner's contentions about its ownership of the riverbed. The Court of Appeal agreed that the fish were caught in the Klamath River on the Reservation, and that Respondent has a federally-reserved right to fish in the Klamath River.

twice) that the California Supreme Court, "does not even mention[]" a 1940 opinion of the Interior Department's Solicitor. In fact, the California Supreme Court specifically referred to that Opinion. Petition, p. A-17.

A seriously misleading omission from the Petition is the failure to mention that Petitioner induced Respondent to waive his right to a speedy trial by making express and unconditional representations to Respondent and the Court of Appeal that the California Supreme Court's decision in McCovey would be dispositive of the jurisdictional issue in this case. There was never any suggestion by Petitioner that it would accept the decision in McCovey as dispositive only if each of its arguments was specifically addressed and rejected.

Yet another example of Petitioner's misleading and/or inaccurate statement of the case is the wholly unsubstantiated and inaccurate characterization of California's permanent and absolute ban on the sale of fish caught in the Klamath River as a necessary and Nondiscriminatory conservation measure. Not only is the record completely devoid of any evidence to support Petitioner's claim, but also the claim could not have been substantiated had an evidentiary hearing been held on that issue.[5/] The plain

---

[5/] Both in People v. McCovey, supra, and in this case, the California Supreme Court found that California's legitimate conservation interests are fully protected by the federal regulations governing fishing by Indians of the Reservation. If the question whether California's absolute and permanent ban on the use of gill nets in the lower 20 miles of the Klamath River by Reservation Indians and the sale of any fish caught in the Klamath River system constitutes a reasonably necessary and non-discriminatory

(continued...)

5/ (...continued)
conservation measure had been raised before the committing magistrate, Respondent would have produced persuasive evidence to prove the following facts: historically, the salmon runs in the Klamath River were predominantly wild-stock fish, and at least until relatively recently, hatchery-bred fish comprised only a small portion of each year's fall spawning run; shifts in the composition of salmon runs have not been caused by Indian fishing; transformation to a predominantly hatchery-based fishery has adverse genetic effects and risks; the salmon resources of the Klamath declined because of destruction of spawning habitat and state-sanctioned overharvest in the ocean while under exclusive State jurisdiction between 1933 and 1975; between 1975 and at least 1985, California consistently refused to support or impose any regulatory regime which would recognize and accommodate the Hoopa Valley Indian salmon fishery, in order to minimize the economic impacts upon the ocean troll fishery of restoring the salmon resources of the Klamath River system; due to "shaker" mortality, the non-Indian ocean troll fishery wastes far more Klamath River salmon than the Indian net fishery harvests, and, according to official reports by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the Pacific Fisheries Management Council, the combined harvest of the non-Indian ocean commercial, ocean sport and in-river sport facts are that California's statutory regulatory scheme does not make and never has made any provision whatsoever for the fisheries consistently has exceeded the total Indian net harvest, sometimes by as much as 1500%; the relative impacts of the various user groups on Klamath River chinook salmon stocks without accounting for either shaker mortality (estimated by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the Pacific Fisheries Management Council to average 30%) or incidental loss of fish in the Indian net fishery (estimated to average 8% or less) show that a properly regulated in-river Indian net fishery is not inherently destructive of the Klamath River's salmon resources; California's ban on the sale of even a single fish caught in the Klamath River serves no valid, non-discriminatory conservation purpose; federal and Tribal resource restoration and law enforcement efforts and expenditures have been substantial, and are increasing; California's conservation interests are more than adequately protected by the existing comprehensive federal scheme of regulation and enforcement, together with the judicial remedies available through the Reservation Court of Indian Offenses (25 C.F.R. Part 250) and the Lacey Act, 16 U.S.C. §3372(a)k; and since 1985 the runs of Klamath River Chinook salmon have exceeded even California's long-term spawning escapement goals. 52 Fed.Reg. 27329-35.

(continued...)

---

5/(...continued)

existence of the right of Indians to use gill nets on the lower Klamath River or to sell fish caught anywhere on the Reservation, and that California's regulations constitute a discriminatory allocation scheme under which virtually the entire burden of conserving the salmon resources of the Klamath River falls upon the in-river Indian net fishery.

Based upon the actual record and proceedings below, the only issues which legitimately could have been presented by a timely petition herein are whether the California Supreme Court correctly determined that events occurring in 1985 did not retroactively vest California with jurisdiction to prosecute Respondent for acts allegedly committed in 1981; that California has no basis upon which to limit the exercise of Respondent's federally-reserved fishing rights to fish which spawn within the boundaries of the Reservation; and that prior decisions of the State and federal courts preclude Petitioner from relitigating an issue which already has been finally adjudicated.

ARGUMENT

I. THE PETITION SHOULD BE DENIED BECAUSE IT IS UNTIMELY.

Under Supreme Court Rule 20.1, a petition for a writ of certiorari to review the judgment in a criminal case of a state court of last resort must be filed within 60 days after the entry of such judgment. 28 U.S.C. §2101(c) requires that a petition for writ of certiorari in a civil case be filed within 90 days after the date of entry of judgment.

Judgment was deemed entered in this case on October 13, 1988, the date upon which the California Supreme Court denied the People's petition for rehearing. The Petition herein was filed on or about January 6, 1989.

This case began as a criminal prosecution. At the conclusion of the preliminary hearing, the defendants moved to dismiss the prosecution for lack of jurisdiction. The magistrate found that the fish at issue had been "taken from the Klamath River within the Reservation . . . " and proceeded to grant the motion to dismiss on the ground that California lacked jurisdiction to prosecute Hoopa Valley Reservation Indians for the taking or disposition of fish caught in Reservation waters. Appendix A, p. 1; see also, Petition, p. A-2-4.

The People moved in the Superior Court to reinstate the prosecution pursuant to California Penal Code ("P.C.") §871.5. Petition, p. A-2. The Superior Court granted the People's motion, relying upon the decision of the California Court of Appeal in People v. McCovey, 145 Cal.App.3d 190 (1984)[6/], which had held that because the Secretary of the Interior's Hoopa Valley Indian fishing regulations prohibited "commercial" fishing, those regulations did not preempt California's jurisdiction to prosecute Reservation Indians for the off-Reservation sale of salmon caught in the Klamath River or other Reservation waters. Accordingly, the prosecution was ordered reinstated. Petition, p. A-2.

Under California law, a Superior Court order under P.C. §871.5 reinstating

---

6/ This decision was reversed by the California Supreme Court in People v. McCovey, 46 Cal. 3d 517, cert. den. 469 U.S. 1062 (1984).

a prosecution is not appealable. Rather, a defendant's only remedy, other than to proceed to trial and then appeal if convicted, is to petition the Court of Appeal for a writ of prohibition pursuant to P.C. §999a. In re Torres, 128 Cal.App.3d 826 (1982).

A petition for a writ of prohibition under P.C. §999a is an original proceeding, but only in the sense that it is first filed in an appellate court. It serves exactly the same function as does a post-conviction appeal on a question of law, but without requiring a full trial before a court which may lack jurisdiction. For this reason, a petition under P.C. §999a must be determined solely upon the record which was before the committing magistrate. Mesaris v. Superior Court, 4 Cal.App.3d 976 (1970); Buck v. Superior Court, 245 Cal.App.2d 431 (1966); People v. McKee, 267 Cal.App.2d 509 (1969); People v. Taylor, 250 Cal.App.2d 367 (1967).

But for the eventually successful petition under P.C. §999a, Respondent Mattz and his co-defendant would have been prosecuted for conspiracy and other felonious acts. If the California Supreme Court had not granted the relief sought that prosecution would have proceeded. Because the issue raised in Respondent's P.C. §999a petition went to the heart of the charges against him, it was an integral part of the underlying criminal prosecution. Thus, the 60-day time limit of Supreme Court Rule 20.1 should apply to the Petition herein. See, e.g., Heflin v. United States, 358 U.S. 415, 416 (n.7) (1959).

The 60-day limit for seeking a writ of certiorari in a criminal case is set by Court rule, rather than statute. Thus, the untimely filing of the Petition in this case is not a jurisdictional defect. However, if the Court's rules are to have any meaning, they should be enforced unless a party can demonstrate a good reason why non-compliance should be excused.

Petitioner has made absolutely no attempt to excuse the untimely filing of the Petition herein, nor can Petitioner make such a showing. The fundamental issues in this case -- i.e., the nature and extent of the fishing rights of the Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation, and California's jurisdiction over the exercise of those rights -- are not issues of first impression.7/ Some of the same attorneys representing Petitioner in this action also represented Petitioner in a number of those earlier cases.[8] Petitioner's counsel are experienced in seeking review and/or actually litigating before this court.[9]

---

7/ See, e.g., Elser v. Gill Net No. 1, 246 Cal.App.2d 30 (1966); Donahue v. Justice Court, 15 Cal.App.3d 557 (1971); (continued...)

Thus, there can be no credible excuse or justification for Petitioner's

---

7/ (...continued)
Mattz v. Arnett, 412 U.S. 481 (1973); Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, supra; Pacific Coast Federation of Fishermen's Ass'n. v. Sect'y. of Commerce, 494 F.Supp. 626 (N.D. Ca. 1980); Blake v. Arnett, 663 F.2d 906 (9th Cir. 1981); United States v. Eberhardt, 789 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986); People v. McCovey, supra. Indeed, the question whether the Klamath River is within the boundaries of the Hoopa Valley Reservation was considered and resolved by this court in 1913. Donnelly v. United States, supra.

8/ See, e.g., Donahue, Mattz v. Arnett, Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, Blake, Eberhardt (as amicus curiae), McCovey.

9/ See, e.g., Mattz v. Arnett, supra; Santa Rosa Band of Indians v. Kings County, 532 F.2d 655 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. den. 429 U.S. 1038; Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, supra, People v. McCovey, supra.

failure to timely file its Petition. If for no other reason than this, the Petition should be denied.

II. GRANTING THE PETITION IS NEITHER NECESSARY NOR APPROPRIATE.

A. The California Supreme Court Correctly Held that Petitioner Is Barred by the Doctrine of Res Judicata/Collateral Estoppel from Relitigating the Existence of the Federally-Reserved Fishing Rights of the Indians of the Reservation.

The Petition consists exclusively of an attack upon the California Supreme Court's rejection of the merits of what Petitioner characterizes as its "main argument" -- i.e., that the Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation have no fishing rights whatsoever because title to the bed of the Klamath River passed to California in 1850.

What the Petition fails to mention, and what Petitioner would like this Court to ignore, is that the California Supreme Court actually based its rejection of this argument on two independent

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

//

grounds.[10] The first of these grounds

---

[10] The Petition also is silent about the two grounds upon which the California Supreme Court reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal prior to addressing Petitioner's "main argument"; i.e., rejection of the Court of Appeal's "novel theory" that alleged changes in resource abundance in 1985 could confer upon California jurisdiction to prosecute acts allegedly committed in 1981; and correction of the Court of Appeal's mistaken assumption that the California Supreme Court's decision in People v. McCovey could be read as limited to fish which actually spawn on the Reservation.

The selective omission of the portions of the California Supreme Court's decision which are fatal to Petitioner's case is typical of Petitioner's duplicity throughout this case. Petitioner induced Respondents to waive their right to a speedy trial by falsely representing that the California Supreme Court's final decision in People v. McCovey would be dispositive in this case. When Petitioner lost in People v. McCovey and this Court denied the petition for a writ of certiorari, Petitioner represented to the California Court of Appeal that the district court's decision in United States v. Wilson, 611 F.Supp. 813 (N.D. Calif. 1985) had created a regulatory void which threatened the extinction of the resource. In fact, United States v. Wilson, id., had invalidated only the ban on fish sales, and left the rest of the was based upon the observation that,

(continued...)

> To begin with, the People's broad claim that Yurok Indians enjoy no federally protected fishing rights in the Klamath River flies directly in the face of all of the recent federal and state decisions involving Yurok Indian fishing on the Hoopa Valley Reservation.

Petition, p. A-18. The accuracy of this observation cannot be disputed. See, e.g., Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, supra; Blake v. Arnett, supra; Pacific Coast Federation of Fishermen's Ass'n. v. Sect'y. of Commerce, supra; United States v. Eber-

---

10/(...continued)
Secretary's regulatory scheme intact. The entire scheme was reinstated by the Ninth Circuit's decision in United States v. Eberhardt, supra, a fact of which the Petitioner never apprised the Court of Appeal.

A review of the petitions for writs of certiorari in Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets and People v. McCovey will show that Petitioner displayed similar disregard for the facts, the record and the truth in its efforts to persuade this Court to grant review in those cases.

hardt, supra; People v. McCovey, supra. Neither can it be disputed that numerous prior decisions -- State and federal -- have established that the Klamath River is within the boundaries of the Hoopa Valley Reservation. See, e.g., Elser v. Gill Net No. 1, supra; Donahue v. Justice Court, supra; United States v. Eberhardt, supra; Donnelly v. United States, supra.11/

11/ [I]n view of all the circumstances, it would be absurd to treat the [1891 executive] order as intended to include the uplands to the width of one mile on each side of the river, and at the same time to exclude the river . . . the reports of the local Indian agents and superintendents to the commissioners of Indian Affairs abound in references to fishing as their principal subsistence, and the river is described as running in a narrow canyon through a broken country, the Indians as dwelling in small villages close to its banks. [Citations.]

(continued...)

To Petitioner's claim that these prior decisions did not expressly consider the historical evidence or legal theory now being advanced,[12] the California Supreme Court held as a matter of California law that,

> The reach of those decisions, however, may not be so readily circumvented. The issue of the existence of federally reserved Indian fishing rights was directly in question in each of these cases, and the State of California was in fact a principal litigant in several of the proceedings. The People had ample opportunity in the prior litigation to challenge the validity of Indian fishing rights in the Klamath River on the theory they now urge. Having failed to successfully pursue such a legal argument in those cases, they may not avoid the holdings of those decisions

---

11/ (...continued)

Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. at 259.

12/ Petitioner offered substantially the same evidence and made the same arguments in People v. McCovey, supra.

> at this juncture by resort to ostensibly newly discovered historic evidence or a new legal theory. (See, e.g., Price v. Sixth District Agricultural Assn. (1927) 201 Cal. 502, 511 ["an issue may not be thus split into pieces. If it has been determined in a former action, it is binding notwithstanding the parties litigant may have omitted to urge for or against it matters which, if urged, would have produced an opposite result."]) This is particularly true in a situation, like the present one, where many individuals have relied on the past decisions over a number of years and where a comprehensive federal regulatory scheme--adopted in the wake of the earlier decisions--has been in place for more than a decade. (Cf. Arizona v. California (1963) 373 U.S. 546, 598.)

Petition, p. A-19.[13/] See, also, Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90 (1980); Bernhard v. Bank of America, 19 Cal.2d 807 (1942); 13/ This holding was especially appropriate in light of this Court's express instruction in Mattz v. Arnett, supra, that the fishing rights issue be addressed on remand.

Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. of Calif. v. McConnell, 44 Cal.App.2d 715 (1955); Vanguard Recording Society v. Fantasy Records, Inc. 24 Cal.App.3d 410 (1972).

The California Supreme Court's adherence to its prior decision in People v. McCovey thus was correct as a matter of California law, and for that reason review by this Court is neither necessary nor appropriate.

B. The California Supreme Court Correctly Rejected on the Merits Petitioner's Argument that the "Equal Footing Doctrine" Precludes the Existence of the Fishing Rights of the Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation.

Petitioner contends that the alleged navigability of the Klamath River in 1850 conferred upon it ownership of the fish which swim in the river, prevented the inclusion of the River in the Hoopa Valley Reservation, and thus prevented the United States from reserving to the Indians of the Reservation the fishing rights which, "are not much less necessary to the Indians [of the Reservation] than the atmosphere they breathed." Blake v. Arnett, supra. Amici join in this argument, notwithstanding that the California Supreme Court's decision has no application outside California.

The principal fatal flaw in Petitioner's argument is its erroneous assumption that purported State ownership of the riverbed necessarily is inconsistent with the right of Reservation Indians to fish therein free of State regulation. This contention is contrary to the massive body of case law which has recognized that the "equal footing" doctrine does not limit the federal government's authority to protect Indians or federal interests in property and natural resources, nor does the doctrine give the State ownership of free-swimming fish in navigable waters.

Under Article I, §8, Cl. 3 of the Constitution, Congress has plenary power not only over international and inter-state commerce, including wildlife, see, e.g., Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322 (1980), but also over all aspects of Indian affairs. United States v. Kagama, 117 U.S. 375 (1986); United States v. Holliday, 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 407 (1865). Under Article IV, §3, Cl. 2, the United States has similar authority over its property and wildlife. Kleppe v. New Mexico, 426 U.S. 529 (1976), even to the extent of reaching beyond the limits of federal lands, Camfield v. United States, 167 U.S. 518 (1867), and preempting state regulation of hunting and fishing in the navigable waters of a state. Minnesota

v. Block, 660 F.2d 1240 (8th cir., 1981), cert. den., 455 U.S. 1007; United States v. Brown, 552 F.2d 817 (8th Cir. 1977), cert. den., 431 U.S. 949.

The only significant constraint on the exercise of federal authority over Indian Affairs is that such exercise must ". . . be tied rationally to the fulfillment of Congress' unique obligation toward the Indians . . ." Morton v. Mancari, 417 U.S. 535, 555 (1974). The power of the United States under the Property Clause is similarly expansive; i.e., federal regulations must be "needful" prescriptions "respecting" federal property. United States v. San Francisco, 310 U.S. 16 (1940); United States v. Brown, supra; United States v. Lindsey, 595 F.2d 5 (9th Cir. 1979).

Thus, the determinative question for jurisdictional purposes has never been whether the federal reservation or regulation of a resource right occurred before or after statehood, but whether the federal action was or is necessary or justifiable in the fulfillment of a proper federal objective. If so, the state's police prerogatives -- even as to hunting or fishing in navigable waters or for migratory wildlife -- will be subordinated to the exercise of federal authority under the Constitution's Supremacy Clause, Article VI, Cl. 2. See, e.g., U.S. v. North Dakota, 650 F.2d 911 (8th Cir. 1981); affirmed, 458 U.S. 1129 (1983); Menominee Tribe v. United States, 391 U.S. 404 (1968).

As was held in Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 598 (1963), decree entered, 376 U.S. 340 (1964), modified, 439 U.S. 419 (1979), further modified, 460 U.S. 605 (1983),

> We have no doubt about the power of the United States under these clauses to reserve water rights for its reservations and its property.

Washington v. Fishing Vessels Ass'n., 443 U.S. 658 (1979), correctly construed the federal power described in Arizona v. California, id., as applying to Indian fishing rights, and the California Supreme Court did the same. See also, Alaska Pacific Fisheries v. United States, 248 U.S. 78 (1918); Minnesota v. Block, supra (Wilderness); United States v. Brown, supra (National Park); United States v. Lindsey, supra, 595 F.2d 5 (National Forest, National Recreation Area, Wild and Scenic River); United States v. Hells Canyon Guide Service, Inc., 660 F.2d 735 (9th Cir. 1981); New England Power Co. v. New Hampshire, 455 U.S. 331 (1982) (hydroelectricity).

Petitioner's argument that California owns the fish swimming in the Klamath River, and thus that the United States lacked the authority to preserve the ability of the Indians of the Reservation to sustain themselves by fishing in the Klamath River and other Reservation waters, is a legal anachronism which has no support in modern case law; indeed, it has been consistently repudiated in a succession of Supreme Court decisions over the past forty years. See, e.g., Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 402 (1948); Douglas v. Seacost Products, Inc., 431 U.S. 265, 284 (1977); Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322 (1980). Thus, in rejecting this argument, the California Supreme Court did no more than this Court repeatedly has done, and there is no reason for this Court to consider the issue yet again.

C. The Circumstances Surrounding the Creation of the Reservation Indicate that the Reservation Includes the Klamath River.

Even if the prior decisions of the courts of California and the United States had not already definitively determined that the Hoopa Valley Reservation includes the Klamath River within its boundaries, there can be no doubt that the primary purpose for which the United States established and enlarged what is now known as the Hoopa Valley Reservation was to protect the Indians from "their deadliest enemies" -- the non-Indian people of the State of California, see, e.g., United States v. Kagama, 118 U.S. 375, 384 (1886), by setting aside a Reservation which would assure the continued availability of the fish and other resources of the Klamath River that were "not much less necessary to the existence of the Indians than the atmosphere that they breathed." Blake v. Arnett, supra, 663 F.2d at 906.

If the 1855 and 1891 Executive Orders which established the original Reservation and then extended the Hoopa Square to encompass the original Reservation had intended to exclude the Klamath River, those orders would have referred to two strips of country, each one mile in width, on either side of the River, or established the banks of the river as the boundaries of the Reservation. See, e.g., Montana v. United States, 50 U.S. 544 (1981). Instead, the Executive Orders set aside a single strip of country, with its outer boundaries measured from the Klamath River.

As the Supreme Court observed in Donnelly v. United States, id., 228 U.S. at 259,

> Indeed, in view of all of the circumstances, it would be absurd to treat the [Executive] order [establishing the Reservation] as intended to include the uplands to the width of 1 mile on each side of the river, and at the same time to exclude the river. As a matter of history, it plainly appears that the Klamath Indians established themselves along the river in order to gain a subsistence by fishing.[14/]

See also, Mattz v. Arnett, supra; Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, supra; Pacific Coast Federation of Fishermen's Ass'n. v. Secretary of Commerce, 494 F.Supp. 626, 632-33 (1980).

Without the Klamath River and the reserved right to fish therein, the Klamath River Reservation would have been 14/ Although the Court withdrew the portion of its opinion that had determined that the river was non-navigable, the Court left intact its holding that the river was within the Reservation, 228 U.S. at 1035. Otherwise, there would have been no federal jurisdiction to prosecute for an offense which may have occurred in the Klamath River.

---

as useless to the Indians for whom it was established as the post-statehood Reservation lands at issue in Arizona v. California, supra, would have been to the Indians thereof without federally-reserved water rights. The California Supreme Court correctly determined that the federal government did not intend such a result, and there is no reason in law or justice why Petitioner should be allowed to rewrite history to reach a contrary conclusion.

CONCLUSION

The untimely and misleading Petition herein seeks to overturn a decision of the California Supreme Court which is consistent with numerous California and federal court decisions of the past several decades, as well as the broader principle of California law that a litigant is not allowed to relitigate an issue ad infinitum simply by offering new legal theories or evidence which could have been presented in prior proceedings. The Petition seeks to inflict this catastrophe upon the Indians of the Hoopa Valley Reservation without an evidentiary record, and without any showing either that there is a valid conservation necessity for the assertion of State jurisdiction, or that California's absolute and permanent ban on Indian sales of fish caught in Reservation waters does not discriminate against the Indians of the Reservation by reserving the entire harvestable portion of the resource to the non-Indian commercial troll and sport fisheries.

Petitioner also asks this Court to countenance a decision by the California Court of Appeal which, while upholding the federally-reserved right of the Indians of the Reservation to fish in the Klamath River, nonetheless held that changes in resource abundance in 1985 gave California jurisdiction to prosecute Respondent for acts committed in 1981, and that California could abolish Indian fishing rights simply by establishing off-Reservation hatcheries.

For all of the reasons set forth above, the Petition should be denied.

Dated: February 14, 1989.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE FORMAN
ALEXANDER & KARSHMER

By: _____
GEORGE FORMAN
Attorney for Respondent
Kenneth Mattz

IN THE JUSTICE COURT OF CALIFORNIA
COUNTY OF DEL NORTE
DEL NORTE JUSTICE DISTRICT

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,

-vs-

DIANE MATTZ, TINA WHIPPLE, TONY FOLKINS, RAYMOND MATTZ, ANDREW WHIPPLE, KENNETH MATTZ, MARVIN MATTZ, DARRELL MOOREHEAD, and FRANKLIN MOOREHEAD, Defendants.

No. 46-19

RULING ON MOTION TO DISMISS

This matter came on regularly for preliminary hearing in the Justice Court of California, County of Del Norte, Del Norte Judicial District, on Monday, May 24, 1982. Judge P. Timothy Murphy was assigned by the Judicial Council to hear the matter.

The evidence introduced in the preliminary hearing consisted of the testimony of John D. Gavitt, special agent for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. The evidence indicates that all Defendants were, in some manner, involved in the commercial sale of salmon off the Reservation taken from the Klamath River within the Reservation at or about the times alleged in the complaint. At the conclusion of his testimony, it was stipulated by District Attorney Weir and all defense counsel that all the above-named defendants were and are eligible Fishers and eligible Indians, pursuant to Title 25, Code of Federal Regulations, Section 258.5, i.e., Indian persons entitled to fish on the Klamath or Trinity River within the confines of the Hoopa Indian Reservation and the "Extension," defined as one mile on either side of the Klamath River from the westerly border of the Hoopa Reservation to the sea. At the close of the evidence introduced by the prosecution, all defense counsel joined in a motion to dismiss the action for lack of jurisdiction, in addition to individual motions reflected in the transcript.

The issue presented by the motion to dismiss is whether the State of California can constitutionally pass legislation and enforce laws which control the manner in which Eligible Indian fishermen can dispose of salmon off the Reservation that have been taken from waters within the Reservation.

The parties have submitted extensive briefs, and after a review of the cases cited by all parties and the pertinent federal regulations, this magistrate concludes that the motion to dismiss must be and shall be granted for lack of jurisdiction.

Federal regulations regulating Klamath River fishing by Indians were first issued on August 12, 1977, and in those initial regulations the Department of the Interior, Bureau of Indian Affairs specifically reserved the question of whether, absent the regulations, the Indians possessed rights to fish commercially in the Klamath River. Interim rules were adopted on July 13, 1978, which, in part, provide in the preamble:

> ...Based upon the history of Indian fishing on the Klamath as well as on the substantial case law interpreting federal fishing rights, the Department has concluded that the Indians' reserved fishing right includes the right to use fish for commercial purposes...
>
> 43 FR 135, pg 30043 (7/13/78)

The federal rules passed in July of 1978 (43 FR 135, pg 30052) specifically provide in Section 258.10 for the method of handling the sale of salmon and steelhead, and also specifically provide for the regulation of fish buyers both on and off the Reservation under Section 258.13. In Section 258.5, as amended, the regulations limited the catching of fish for sale to no more than five anadromous fish per day per person. The regulations were expanded, by the final rules enacted by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, Department of the Interior, on March 20, 1979. These regulations are extremely detailed and, among other things, specifically define commercial fishing under Section 248.4(b) and subsistence of consumptive fishing under subdivision (r). Under Section 258.8(c) commercial fishing was prohibited for that year and the regulations provided for a comprehensive plan and method of enforcement for violation of any of the regulations under Sections 258.14 and 258.15. Section 258.17 specifically provides:

> The Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation Court of Indian Offenses established under 25 CFR Part II has jurisdiction which is limited to trying eligible Indians accused of violating the regulations of this Part and to determine whether nets and other fishing gear were forfeited.

Further regulations were passed in 1980 and 1981 modifying and changing various rules but consistently providing for a penalty on Indian fishers for violation of the rules, including violating the seasonal prohibitions against commercial fishing. Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets (1975) 48 Cal.Ap.3d 454, noted that Indians made their living by commercial fishing in the early years of the century, and further noted that Public Law 280, 28 USC 1360, provides that its application shall not deprive any Indian or tribal band of any right, privilege or immunity under federal treaty, agreement or statute with respect to hunting, trapping, fishing, or the control, licensing or regulation thereof. [Emphasis added.]

The State of California, through Section 8685.6 and 8434, Fish and Game Code, is clearly attempting to control commercial salmon fishing by the Indians of the Hoopa Reservation.

At this time it appears that the three tests to reach this decision, as indicated by the court in People v. Frank, 101 CA3d Supp8 (1979), have been met -- especially as it refers to the regulation of the salmon fishery:

(1) The federal regulations are now extremely detailed and comprehensive as to the regulation of the salmon fishing on the Klamath River and it is reasonable to infer that Congress left no room for states to supplement them.

(2) The federal regulations specifically indicate that the commercial salmon fishery by Indians is in fact now regulated in an area exclusively under Federal jurisdiction.

(3) Enforcement of state law does in fact present a serious conflict with the administration of the federal program.

Having ruled that this court has no jurisdiction, it is unnecessary to rule on the other pending motions; and the complaint against the above-named defendants is hereby dismissed.

DATED: June 8, 1982

/s/ R. Timothy Murphy
Assigned Judge

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM 1975

No. 75-527

G. RAYMOND ARNETT, DIRECTOR, DEPARTMENT OF FISH AND GAME, STATE OF CALIFORNIA, PETITIONER

v.

5 GILL NETS, ETC., AND RAYMOND MATTZ

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE CALIFORNIA COURT OF APPEAL, FIRST DISTRICT, DIVISION THREE

MEMORANDUM FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE

This memorandum is submitted in response to the Court's order of December 15, 1975, inviting the Solicitor General to express the views of the United States in this case.

STATEMENT

The decision below was rendered on remand from this Court's decision in Mattz v. Arnett, 412 U.S. 481.

In 1969 a California game warden seized five gill nets owned by Raymond Mattz, a Yurok (Klamath River) Indian, and instituted a forfeiture proceeding in state court on the ground that the nets were contraband under the Califoria Fish and Game Code. When seized, the nets were being stored some 200 feet from the Klamath River within the Klamath River Indian Reservation.[1] Mattz intervened in the forfeiture proceeding asserting his ownership of the nets, his use of them at his family's traditional fishing location, and the inapplicability of the California Fish and Game Code to his fishing activities within the Reservation. The state trial court held that the Reservation had been abolished and ordered the forfeiture. The state court of appeal affirmed (see Mattz, supra, 412 U.S. at 483–485). This Court reversed, holding that the Reservation had not been abolished and that all land within it remained "Indian country" within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. 1151 (412 U.S. at 506). The Court remanded the case for determination of the "questions relating to the existence of Mattz' fishing rights and to the applicability of California law notwithstanding reservation status" (id. at 485).

On remand, the state trial court, after an evidentiary hearing (see Pet. App. 12), held that the State may not regulate fishing by Indians on the Klamath River Reservation and ordered the nets returned (see Pet. App. 2). The state court of appeal, in a thorough opinion, affirmed (Pet. App. 1–12). The court held that the creation of a reservation "'for Indian purposes' encompasses the right to hunt and fish on the reservation without further specification" (Pet. App. 8), citing, inter alia, Menominee Tribe v. United States, 391 U.S. 404, and that "[t]his is particularly clear on the reservation in question which was obviously chosen with reference to the fishing," citing Mattz, supra, 412 U.S. at 487 (Pet. App. 8).

[1] The nets were located on land owned by a logging company (Pet. App. 2).

The court also rejected the State's contention that the State had acquired jurisdiction to regulate Indian fishing within the Reservation as a consequence of Public Law 280, 67 Stat. 588, 18 U.S.C. 1162 (Pet. App. 4–9). That Act extends to the State of California jurisdiction over offenses committed by Indians within Indian country in the State, but also provides (18 U.S.C. 1162(b)) that nothing therein shall deprive any Indian or Indian tribe of any fishing right "afforded under Federal treaty, agreement, or statute." The court rejected the State's contention that the proviso did not apply to the Klamath River Reservation because the Reservation was established by executive order, noting that the Reservation was "not created by executive order but by statute"—the Act of March 3, 1853, 10 Stat. 226, 238, by which the President was authorized to set aside five reservations "for Indian purposes" (Pet. App. 5–6). The court also rejected the State's contention that the proviso was intended to exclude fishing rights granted by executive order, finding such an interpretation to be unwarranted by the legislative history of the Act (id. at 6–8).

Finally, the court rejected, as unsupported by the facts, the State's contention that it had authority to regulate fishing within the Reservation as a necessary conservation measure. The court found "[t]he record on this argument * * * not persuasive" (Pet. App. 11, see discussion at 11–12).[2]

The Supreme Court of California denied the State's petition for review (Pet. App. 15).

ARGUMENT

In our view the decision below is correct, does not conflict with any decision of this Court or any other court, and presents no issue of general importance requiring review by this Court.

1. The history of the establishment of the Klamath River Indian Reservation by executive orders and congressional Acts as a home for the Yurok Indians and other tribes that lived and fished along the Klamath River, is set forth in detail in Mattz, supra, 412 U.S. at 485–494. The California court of appeal correctly held that the creation of the Reservation under these circumstances reserved to the Indians the right to fish on the Reservation without state interference.

There are two sources of this right. First, it stems from the general principle that bars the States from exercising jurisdiction over the activities of Indians within Indian reservations, except where affirmatively authorized by Congress. See McClanahan v. Arizona State Tax Commission, 411 U.S. 164, 167–173; Williams v. Lee, 358 U.S. 217; see also Mescalero Apache Tribe v. Jones, 411 U.S. 145, 147–149; Alva Fisher v. The District Court of the Sixteenth Judicial District of Montana, No. 75–5366, decided Per curiam, March 1, 1976. Second, the special right to hunt and fish free from limitation by state authorities is implicit in the reservation of the land. Menominee Tribe v. United States, 391 U.S. 404, 406, 412, n. 12. This is particularly clear here, for as the Court noted in Mattz, supra, 412 U.S. at 487, the Klamath River site was chosen as a reservation because it was the Indians' historic home and the river "abounded in salmon and other fish."

[2] The court also rejected the State's contention that it could confiscate the nets because they were on non-Indian land (Pet. App. 9–10).

That executive orders played a prominent role in the creation of the Reservation does not change this result. Regardless of the manner in which a reservation is created the purpose is generally the same: to create a federally-protected refuge for the tribe. Accordingly, in Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, the Court rejected Arizona's argument that water rights for Indian reservations could only be reserved by treaty and that four executive-order reservations along the lower Colorado River lacked reserved water rights. 373 U.S. at 598. See also United States v. Walker River Irr. Dist., 104 F. 2d 334 (C.A. 9).

Nor has the Court drawn distinctions, for purposes of criminal jurisdiction, on the basis of the method of establishing a reservation. The Colville Reservation, which was the subject of the Court's decision in Seymour v. Superintendent, 368 U.S. 51, holding state criminal law inapplicable to crimes involving Indians anywhere within an Indian reservation, was a reservation established by executive order. See also Antoine v. Washington, 420 U.S. 194, 205–206.

With respect to fishing rights we see no reason why a reservation validly established by executive order should be treated differently from other reservations.

2. Petitioner's primary contention (Pet. 12–25) is that Public Law 280 granted the State control over Indian fishing on the Klamath River Reservation. Congress, in Public Law 280, granted California "jurisdiction over offenses committed by or against Indians in the areas of Indian country" within the State. 18 U.S.C. 1162. However, the statute continues with the proviso that (18 U.S.C. 1162(b)):

> Nothing in this section shall * * * deprive any Indian or any Indian tribe, band, or community of any right, privilege, or immunity afforded under Federal treaty, agreement, or statute with respect to hunting, trapping, or fishing or the control, licensing, or regulation thereof.

Petitioner argues that the proviso is inapplicable to Indian fishing on the Klamath River Reservation because the Reservation, and thus any fishing right, was established by executive order rather than "treaty, agreement, or statute." The court of appeal properly rejected this contention (Pet. App. 4–9).

In Metlakatla Indian Community v. Egan, 369 U.S. 45, 57, this Court interpreted the same proviso as protecting Indian fishing rights established by regulation, despite the absence of the word "regulation" in the proviso. The Court pointed out that the authority to make the regulation was statutory and that "[t]he apparent purpose of the proviso was to preserve federally granted fishing rights" (emphasis added), even though created by regulation.

Likewise, the fishing rights enjoyed by the Indians in connection with this Reservation are afforded by statute—the statutes authorizing establishment of the Reservation. As this Court recognized, in Mattz the Reservation was set aside by executive order in 1855 or 1891. In either case the executive order was based on previous Acts of Congress—the Acts of March 3, 1853, 10 Stat. 226, 238, and March 3, 1855, 10 Stat. 686, 699, or the Act of April 8, 1864, 13 Stat. 39; see Mattz, supra, 412 U.S. at 484, 487–494. See, also, Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 243, 255–259.

Petitioner suggests (Pet. 17) that rights based on executive order were deliberately not protected in Public Law 280 because Congress set out to safeguard only those rights for which it might owe compensation under the Fifth Amendment, and that under Sioux Tribe v. United States, 316 U.S. 317, no compensation would be owed for abolishing a reservation created by executive order. There is, however, nothing in the legislative history of the Act stating such a purpose. Moreover, there is no reason why Indians on a reservation established by executive order should have less right of self-government or less protection for their resources from state interference than Indians on other reservations. There is thus no reason to assume that Congress intended to preserve fishing rights on all reservations but those established by executive order.

3. Petitioner's final contentions (Pet. 25–42) are that even if respondent has a fishing right as a result of the creation of the Reservation, and even if that right has been preserved by Public Law 280, the right is subject to state regulation when exercised on non-Indian owned land, the right may be limited by the State to subsistence fishing, and the right may be regulated by the State in the interest of conservation. We deal with these in turn.

a. Respondent's fishing within the Reservation was at his family's traditional fishing spot on the river (Pet. App. 10), not on private land. The nets were stored on private land, but without objection by the landowner. No issue is presented here regarding the right of an Indian to fish from private land. Cf. Antoine v. Washington, 420 U.S. 194, 212 (Douglas concurring); see also United States v. Winans, 198 U.S. 371.

b. Petitioner cites no authority, and we know of none, that would limit an Indian's on-reservation hunting or fishing to subsistence. The purpose of a reservation is not to restrict Indians to a subsistence economy but to encourage them to use the assets at their disposal for their betterment. See McClanahan, supra, 411 U.S. at 169–171. Moreover, Indian fishing rights have on several occasions been interpreted by this Court as extending to commercial fishing. Alaska Pacific Fisheries v. United States, 248 U.S. 78; Puyallup Tribe v. Department of Game, 391 U.S. 392, 395–396; Department of Game v. Puyallup Tribe, 414 U.S. 44, 48. The court of appeal thus properly rejected petitioner's contention that the State could prohibit net fishing by respondent as a means of limiting him to subsistence fishing (Pet. App. 8–9).

c. The court of appeal also properly rejected petitioner's contention that it could impose its prohibition of net fishing against respondent as a conservation measure (Pet. App. 11–12). We know of no authority that would permit state regulation of Indian fishing within an Indian reservation for conservation purposes. State regulation, where necessary for conservation, has been permitted in regard to the exercise of off-reservation Indian hunting and fishing rights. Puyallup Tribe, supra; Antoine v. Washington, supra. But even in regard to off-reservation rights there must be a factual showing of the necessity for restricting the Indian right rather than restricting the hunting and fishing privileges of others. See Antoine v. Washington, supra, 420 U.S. at 207. There has been no such showing here (Pet. App. 10–12).[3]

CONCLUSION

The petition for a writ of certiorari should be denied.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT H. BORK,
Solicitor General.

MARCH 1976.

---

[3] The affidavit of Duncan Snell (Pet. App. 25–27), which petitioner filed with the Clerk and which concerns alleged fishing abuses on the Reservation after the decision of the court of appeal, may be relevant to future litigation or administrative action by the tribe or the United States, but it has no bearing on the issue of this case, which is whether the State acted within its authority in seizing respondent's nets in 1969. There is no evidence that respondent's fishing was in any way detrimental to conservation.

U.S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1976

(5)

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
FEB 17 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-1128

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Petitioner,

vs.

ANTONE FOLKINS, et al.,
Respondents.

On Writ of Certiorari to the California Supreme Court

OPPOSITION TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

dohn r. henion

516 Second Street
Crescent City, CA 95531
(707) 464-9761

Attorney for Respondent
Antone Folkins

36p

QUESTION PRESENTED

The question presented is whether the federal government by virtue of the United States Constitution's supremacy and commerce clauses and pursuant to Congress' trust responsibilities to the Indian people exceeded its authority in regulating fishing resources for the commerce and subsistence of Indian people in waters flowing through an Indian reservation.

PARTIES

The respondents are Antone Folkins and Kenneth Mattz. The petitioners are the People of the State of California, the real party in interest below. The State of Alaska has filed an amicus curiae brief in behalf of the States of Alaska, Colorado, Kansas, Montana, Nevada, North Dakota, Oklahoma, and Wyoming.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
Question Presented	i
Opinions Below	2
Applicable Statutes	2
Statement of the Case	3
1. Background of the Controversy	3
2. The Proceedings Below	4
Jurisdiction	8
1. The Court should decline review of the petition because it was filed out of time	8
2. This Court should decline to find jurisdiction since the State failed to raise a substantial federal question in that Petitioner failed to follow State procedures in raising the federal question	9
3. This Court should decline to find jurisdiction since the State failed to raise a substantial federal question in that Petitioner seeks this Court to make factual determinations not proven at the trial court level	10
4. This Court should decline to find jurisdiction since the State failed to raise a substantial federal question in that the State Supreme Court decision below is not in conflict with the prior decisions of this Court and lower federal courts	11

Table of Contents

Page

5. This Court should decline to find jurisdiction because it lacks justiciability in that the underlying criminal case is moot having been dismissed by the Superior Court of the State of California on February 17, 1989 12

Argument 13

I. The petition should be denied because Petitioner is barred from raising the federal question under the doctrine of res judicata 13

II. The petition should be denied because the Department of the Interior had the authority to promulgate regulations governing Indian commerce and subsistence fishing in waters flowing through an Indian reservation under authority of its trust responsibility to Indian peoples and under the supremacy and commerce clauses of the United States Constitution .. 15

Conclusion 17

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

Cases

	Page
Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90 (1980)	15
Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 597-598 (1963)	11
Arnett v. Five Gill Nets, 48 Cal App 3d 454 (1975).	4, 5
Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 531 n.13 (1979)	9
Bernhard v. Bank of America, 19 Cal. 2d 807 (1942)	15
Blake v. Arnett, 663 F.2d 906 (9th Cir. 1981)	4
Buck v. Superior Court, 245 Cal App 2d 431 (1966)	9
Cardinale v. Louisiana, 394 U.S. 437, 439 (1969)	11
Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 1 (1831)	16
DeFunis v. Odegaard, 416 U.S. 312, 319 (1974)	12
Donahue v. Justice Court, 15 Cal App 3d 357 (1971)	4
Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 243 (1913)	4
Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 1035	10
Edelman v. California, 344 U.S. 357 (1953).	9
Elser v. Gill Net Number One, 246 Cal App 2d 30 (1966)	4
Equitable Life Assurance Society v. Brown, 187 U.S. 308, 311 (1902)	15
Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570, 572 (1961)	9
Fry Roofing Company v. Wood, 344 U.S. 157, 160 (1952)	10
Grayson v. Harris, 267 U.S. 352, 358 (1925)	10
Heflin v. United States, 358 U.S. 415 (1959)	8
Hulbert v. Chicago, 202 U.S. 275 (1906)	9

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES

	Page
In Re Lamkin, 355 U.S. 59 (1957)	9
Layne & Bowler Corp.v. Western Well Works, 261 U.S 387, 392-393 (1923)	11
Liverpool S.S. Co. v. Commissioners of Emigration, 113 U.S. 33, 39 (1885)	12
Mattz v. Arnett, 412 U.S. 481 (1973)	4
Minnesota by Alexander v. Block, 660 F.2d 1240, 1252, cert. denied 455 U.S. 1007 (1981)	16
People v. Brice, 130 Cal App 3d 201, 208 (1982)	7
People v. McCovey, 36 Cal 3d 517 (1984)	7,8
People v. McKee, 267 Cal App 2d 509 (1969)	9
People v. Taylor, 250 Cal App 2d 367 (1967)	9
Portland Ry. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 299 U.S. 397, 412 (1913)	10
Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 401 (1975)	12
Steffler v. Thompson, 415 U.S. 452, 459 n.10 (1974)	12
Texas v. Mead, 465 U.S. 1041 (1984)	11
United States v. Eberhardt, 789 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986)	4
United States v. Helsley, 16 F.2d 784, 788 (9th Cir. 1979)	16
United States v. Johnson, 268 U.S. 220, 227 (1925)	11
United States v. North Dakota, 650 F.2d 911, 917, 458 U.S. 1129 (1983)	16
Washington v. Florida Industrial Comm., 389 U.S. 235, 240 (1967)	16

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES

Page

Wiggins Bros. Inc. v. Department of Energy, 667 F.2d 77, 83, cert. denied 102 S.Ct. 1749 (1982) 9

Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 96-98 (1961) . . 8

Worchester v. Georgia, 31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 515 (1832) 16

Statutes, Constitutional Provisions, Regulations and Court Rules

U.S. Constitution

Art. I, §8 3

Art. III 12

Art. IV, §3, Cl. 2 2

Art. VI, Cl. 2 2

United States Code

Title 25 U.S.C. §§2, 9, and 262 17

Regulations

25 C.F.R. §258 . . . . . .5, 17

Court Rules

Supreme Court Rule 17.1(c) 11

Supreme Court Rule 20.1 8

Supreme Court Rule 21.1(h) 10

State

Fish and Game Code

§8434 4

§8685.6 4

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

STATUTES, CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS, REGULATIONS AND COURT RULES

	Page
Penal Code
§871.5	6
§872	5
§995	7, 9
Other Statutes, Resolutions
228 U.S. at 709-710	10

No. 88-1128

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Petitioner,

vs.

ANTONE FOLKINS, et al.,
Respondents.

On Writ of Certiorari to the California Supreme Court

OPPOSITION TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

OPINIONS BELOW

The decision of the California Supreme Court is reported at 46 Cal 3d 355 and is reprinted in Petitioner's App. 1. The decision of the California Court of Appeal is reported at 195 Cal App. 3d 431 and is reprinted in Petitioner's App. 31. The decision of the California Superior Court has not been officially reported but is reprinted in Petitioner's App. 45. The decision of the Del Norte County Justice Court, Del Norte Judicial District has not been officially reported but is reprinted at App. 1.

APPLICABLE STATUTES

In addition to the federal laws set forth in the Petition, Respondent contends that the following Articles of the United States Constitution are applicable:

Article VI, Clause 2 states:

> "Supreme Law of Land
>
> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding."

Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 states:

> "Public Lands
>
> The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

Article I, Section 8 vests power in Congress at Clause 3 as follows:

"To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes;"

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

1. Background of the Controversy

The Yurok Indians had long resided along the banks of the Klamath River before the State of California's admission to the Union in 1850. The area was ideal for the Yuroks because they subsisted on the salmon and other fish that abounded in the river. Five years after the state's admission to the Union, President Franklin Pierce formally established the Klamath River Reservation by executive order.

In 1876 the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation was formally set aside for Indian purposes pursuant to Congressional legislation of 1864. In 1891, the original Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation was extended by executive order to include a connecting strip between it and the Klamath River Reservation. This connecting strip was thirty miles in length and roughly two miles wide. The northern and southern exterior boundaries of the connecting strip were described as one mile in width on each side of the Klamath River from the present limits of the Hoopa Valley Reservation to the Pacific Ocean. The Klamath River Reservation was then considered part of the Hoopa Valley Reservation, as extended.

The history of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation has been extensively detailed in two United States Supreme Court, and numerous lower court, decisions over the past seventy-five years; viz., Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 243 (1913); Mattz v. Arnett, 412 U.S. 481 (1973); United States v. Eberhardt, 789 F.2d 1354 (9th Cir. 1986); Blake v. Arnett, 663 F.2d 906 (9th Cir. 1981); Elser v. Gill Net Number One, 246 Cal App 2d 30 (1966); Arnett v. Five Gill Nets, 48 Cal App 3d 454 (1975); Donahue v. Justice Court, 15 Cal App 3d 357 (1971).

In general, this case presents the latest theory, in a long line of alternate theories, argued by the State of California in asserting why it should be entitled to regulate fishing by Indians on the Klamath River.

2. The Proceedings Below

The instant criminal case was filed in the Justice Court of the Del Norte County Judicial District on January 19, 1982. The complaint charged respondents and eight other persons with criminal violations of law allegedly occurring in September 1981. The alleged violations were certain criminal violations of law prohibiting the sale of Klamath River salmon caught by gill net (Fish and Game Code §§ 8685.6, 8434) and conspiracy with others to commit said violations of law.

Respondents joined in a demurrer filed by a co-defendant which alleged a lack of State jurisdiction to prosecute Indian fishers who were subject to federal regulations promulgated by the Department of the Interior, Bureau of Indian Affairs. The thrust of the argument was a theory of federal preemption.

The Del Norte County District Attorney, representing the People of the State of California, filed a lengthy opposition to the demurrer. The theory argued by the State's brief was that although the fish were taken within the reservation the event of sale occurred at least twenty-five miles outside the exterior boundaries of the reservation; thereby conferring State law jurisdiction over said sale. It was argued that since the Department of the Department of the Interior regulations set out in 25 CFR §258, et seq. prohibited commercial salmon fishing, as did the State statutes, there was "complete accord, and that there was no danger of a conflict between the State and Federal programs." The People cited Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets, 48 Cal App 3d 454 (1975) in support of an argument that although the State may not regulate Indian subsistence fishing on the Klamath River, Indian commercial fishing was an open question subject to possible regulation by the State.

The demurrer was denied by the Court and the matter was set for a preliminary hearing. Under California law, a preliminary hearing is an evidentiary hearing at which the prosecution must establish probable cause that a criminal offense occurred and that the accused committed the offense charged. (Penal Code §872.)

The evidence at the preliminary hearing consisted totally of the testimony of a Deparment of Interior, Fish and Wildlife agent relating to the alleged purchases of salmon in Crescent City, California and Medford, Oregon; 30 miles and 120 miles, respectively, from the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation. There was a stipulation between the parties that Respondents were eligible Indian fishers of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation. Although the People were willing to stipulate that all the fish involved were taken from the Klamath River within the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation by means of a gill net, Respondents declined that stipulation. No testimony was taken regarding the navigability of the Klamath River nor was any evidence presented that the Klamath River lay outside the actual reservation. At the preliminary hearing the Court declined to take judicial notice of letters from the Secretary of Interior.

At the conclusion of the preliminary hearing Respondents moved that the matter be dismissed since the federal regulatory scheme had preempted an inconsistent State scheme as to Indian fishers of the reservation. In arguing the matter the District Attorney conceded the authority of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to regulate fishing by the Indians on the reservation. The prosecution agreed that the federal regulations apply to the waters of the Klamath and Trinity Rivers and their tributaries within the exterior boundaries of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation. The prosecution submitted the defendants' motion to dismiss upon the same points and authorities it had previously filed for the purposes of the demurrer.

On June 9, 1982, the Del Norte County Justice Court Judge, assigned, P. Timothy Murphy, issued a written opinion based upon the briefs and arguments of counsel relative to the issues and facts submitted at the preliminary hearing. The court framed the issue presented as ". . . whether the State of California can constitutionally pass legislation and enforce laws which control the manner in which eligible Indian fishermen can dispose of salmon off the reservation that have been taken from waters within the reservation." App. 2. The Court found that the State had no jurisdiction to prosecute the crimes alleged because the federally promulgated regulatory scheme preempted that field of conflicting State legislation. App. 2.

On June 18, 1982, the State filed a motion pursuant to Penal Code §871.5 to reinstate the complaint on the basis that, as a matter of law, the magistrate erroneously dismissed the action. The People defined their position in a concurrently filed petition for writ of mandate. That writ's points and authorities conceded that the State could not regulate subsistence fishing on the Klamath River because of its reservation status -- but sought to distinguish the instant matter because the salmon were sold off the reservation. The State then urged the Court to find that Congress had not shown a clear and manifest intention to preempt State law. Nowhere did the prosecution contend that the fish were not caught on the reservation because the State held title to the Klamath River as a navigable waterway.

The Superior Court granted the prosecution's motion to reinstate the complaint. The Respondents thereafter moved to dismiss the complaint under California Penal Code §995 on the grounds that the Respondents were not legally committed by magistrate because the State lacked jurisdiction to so prosecute Indian fishers. An alternate theory to the motion was that the Respondents were committed without reasonable or probable cause to believe a crime had occurred and that they committed it. With few exceptions, a Penal Code §995 motion is based and decided exclusively on the transcript of the preliminary hearing. People v. Brice, 130 Cal App 3d 201, 208 (1982).

The hearing on the motion to dismiss was held on January 14, 1983, almost eight months after the preliminary hearing. There, for the first time, while the Superior Court sat as a reviewing court, did the State present the arguments now sought to be raised before this Court. Respondents timely objected to the State's requests for the use of judicial notice to present new evidence and attempts to raise new evidence not presented to, and thus not considered by, the Justice Court judge at the preliminary examination. The motion to dismiss was denied by the Superior Court. App. 8.

Respondents sought a writ of prohibition from the California First District Court of Appeals to prohibit the further prosecution of the charges based upon the State's lack of jurisdiction to prosecute the matter. The writ was stipulated to be held in abeyance pending the final disposition of People v. McCovey, 36 Cal 3d 517 (1984) - a case with identical issues.

After McCovey was resolved in favor of federal preemption Respondents abandoned their writ. The State opposed the abandonment and the writ was denied on State police power grounds.

The California Supreme Court granted certiorari and its ruling is the subject of the issues pending before this Court.

JURISDICTION

1. The Court Should Decline Review of the Petition Because it was Filed Out of Time.

Rule 20.1 of the Supreme Court of the United States deems a petition for review on certiorari in a criminal case to be timely if filed within sixty days of entry of judgment. Petitioner filed the instant petition eighty-six days after denial of rehearing by the California Supreme Court.

The fact that the matter before the Court is a criminal case cannot be reasonably disputed. Respondents are charged with violations of law and their liberty is in jeopardy. Although the pending proceedings can be characterized as civil in nature the case is a criminal one. The rule of court does not say in criminal proceedings or criminal actions, it says in criminal cases.

Review of criminal cases by States interested in prosecution is disfavored because of this Court's concern over constitutional rights, e.g. the right to speedy trial. Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 96-98 (1961).

Even this court in Heflin v. United States, 358 U.S. 415 (1959), while stretching to grant certiorari, stated that a number of justices felt the petition should have been filed within the thirty day limit for criminal cases but that the defect was not jurisdictional.

An important consideration is that this case has been pending for over eight years since the acts were alleged to have occurred. Defendants were induced to hold their writ of prohibition in abeyance while People v. McCovey, 36 Cal 3d 517 (1984) was decided. At the State's request a document was executed and filed by Respondent waiving time to be brought to trial until ninety days after the filing of the remittitur of People v. McCovey, supra. Respondents attempted to abandon their writ of prohibition pending before the California appellate courts after the McCovey court decided in favor of persons with issues similar to Respondents. This abandonment of the petition was prevented by the State's opposition to it and Respondent is still awaiting dismissal or trial.

2. This Court Should Decline to Find Jurisdiction Since the State Failed to Raise a Substantial Federal Question in that Petitioner Failed to Follow State Procedures in Raising the Federal Question.

This Court has consistently held that a litigant seeking review must have followed applicable State procedures in raising any federal question asserted. In Re Lamkin, 355 U.S. 59 (1957); Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570, 572 (1961); Hulbert v. Chicago, 202 U.S. 275 (1906); Edelman v. California, 344 U.S. 357 (1953).

As previously mentioned, Petitioner did not assert that the Klamath River was not a part of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation at the trial court level. This theory was first advanced before the Superior Court as it sat as a reviewing tribunal considering whether the action should be dismissed pursuant to Penal Code §995.

Respondent immediately objected to Petitioner's inappropriate and untimely raising of this issue. It is a firm and long held California procedural rule that the only evidence which may be considered by a reviewing court is evidence actually presented to the committing magistrate. Buck v. Superior Court, 245 Cal App 2d 431 (1966); People v. McKee, 267 Cal App 2d 509 (1969); People v. Taylor, 250 Cal App 2d 367 (1967). Federal decisions are in accord with the well reasoned rule that arguments not raised below prior to review are improper and will not be considered by an appellate court absent exceptional circumstances. Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 531 n.13 (1979); Wiggins Bros. Inc. v. Department of Energy, 667 F.2d 77, 83, cert. denied 102 S.Ct. 1749 (1982).

Rule 21.1(h) of the Supreme Court of the United States requires a petitioner seeking review of a state court decision to meet the burden that the question was properly raised by specifying in the statement of the case "the stage in the proceeding both in the court of first instance and in the appellate court, the method or manner of raising the federal question and the way in which they were passed upon by the court." The petition fails to even address its burden on this issue.

3. This Court Should Decline to Find Jurisdiction Since the State Failed to Raise a Substantial Federal Question in that Petitioner Seeks this Court to Make Factual Determinations Not Proven at the Trial Court Level.

This Court's policy that it will not exert its jurisdiction merely to review a decision of a state court based upon a question of fact, and that once a case is otherwise before it, the Court generally will not re-examine the state court's findings and conclusions of fact is well founded considering the number of petitions coming before it. Grayson v. Harris, 267 U.S. 352, 358 1925; Portland Ry. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 299 U.S. 397, 412 (1913); Fry Roofing Company v. Wood, 344 U.S. 157, 160 (1952).

Petitioner runs afoul of this court rule in two respects. First, the Petitioner's federal question is premised upon the assumption that the Klamath River is a navigable stream. Second, the trial court made a finding of fact that the fish were taken within the reservation. App. 1. No testimony was offered and no judicial notice was taken on this issue. Indeed this Court, in Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 1035, after initially deciding that the Klamath River was non-navigable determined not to take judicial notice of its navigability as this factual determination should be made by a lower court. Indeed the Donnelly court specifically declined to take judicial notice of the purported navigability of the Klamath River. 228 U.S. at 709-710.

Petitioner alternatively asserts that the reservation does not include the Klamath River because of the language of the executive order and the State's admission into the Union prior to the formal recognition of the reservation. The trial court's finding that the fish were taken from waters within the reservation should not be re-examined by this court. App. 2. As this Court stated in United States v. Johnson, 268 U.S. 220, 227 (1925), "We do not grant a certiorari to review evidence and discuss specific facts." See Texas v. Mead, 465 U.S. 1041 (1984).

4. This Court Should Decline to Find Jurisdiction Since the State Failed to Raise a Substantial Federal Question in that the State Supreme Court Decision below is not in Conflict with the Prior Decisions of this Court and Lower Federal Courts.

Rule 17.1(c) of the Supreme Court of the United States requires that a court of appeals has "decided a federal question in a way in conflict with applicable decisions of this Court." There must be a real or "intolerable" conflict on the same matter of law or fact, not merely an inconsistency in dicta or in the general principles utilized. Layne & Bowler Corp. v. Western Well Works, 261 U.S. 387, 392-393 (1923). Petitioner urges review based on jurisdiction arising out of an alleged conflict between federal decisions and the California Supreme Court decision because the lower court quoted from Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 597-598 (1963) which addressed the reserved rights doctrine. The Court correctly stated that under the commerce clause of the United States Constitution the federal government retains the power to regulate navigable water ways for purposes of a reservation. The California Supreme Court declared that at the time the reservation was first created, the fishing rights of Yurok Indians were no less necessary to the existence of the Indians than the atmosphere they breathed. Petitioner's App. 20.

As a number of cases have held, the federal government retains the power under the supremacy and commerce clauses of the United States Constitution to regulate fish and wildlife in observance of its trust relationship to Indian people. These authorities supporting this doctrine are discussed more extensively in the section set aside for that purpose in this brief under Argument.

5. This Court Should Decline to Find Jurisdiction Because it Lacks Justiciability in that the Underlying Criminal Case is Moot Having Been Dismissed by the Superior Court of the State of California on February 17, 1989.

Article III of the United States Constitution defines and limits the judicial power of the United States in terms as specified kinds of "cases" and "controversies". The Article III judicial power to decide only cases in controversy means that this Court should exercise its jurisdiction to determine the constitutionality of federal or state legislative acts only in the context of adjudging "the legal rights of litigants in actual controversies." Liverpool S.S. Co. v. Commissioners of Emigration, 113 U.S. 33, 39 (1885). The rule in federal court that an actual live controversy must be extant at all stages of appellate or certiorari review, not merely at the time the information is filed. Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 401 (1975); Steffler v. Thompson, 415 U.S. 452, 459 n.10 (1974); DeFunis v. Odegaard, 416 U.S. 312, 319 (1974).

The underlying criminal case in this matter was dismissed against Respondents Antone Folkins and Kenneth Mattz by the Superior Court of the State of Califoria, County of Del Norte, on February 17, 1989. App. 10.

ARGUMENT

I. The Petition Should be Denied Because Petitioner is Barred from Raising the Federal Question Under the Doctrine of Res Judicata.

This Court should deny review of the federal question raised in the petition because it is "blocked" in that the California Supreme Court ruled that the Petitioner is precluded, under the doctrine of res judicata, from re-litigating the issue; an independent State ground. Cardinale v. Louisiana, 394 U.S. 437, 439 (1969); Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 218-220 (1983). The California Supreme Court held at Petitioner's App. 18-19 as follows:

> "To begin with, the People's broad claim that Yurok Indians enjoy no federally protected fishing rights in the Klamath River flies directly in the face of all of the recent federal and state decisions involving Yurok Indian fishing on the Hoopa Valley Reservation. As we have seen, in 1975 the California Court of Appeal specifically held in Five Gill Nets, supra, 48 Cal.App.3d 454, certiorari denied (1976) 425 U.S. 907, that state regulation of such on-reservation Indian fishing was preempted by the Indian's federally protected fishing rights; that holding, of course, is totally incompatible with People's present contention that the Yurok Indians enjoy no federally protected fishing rights in the Klamath River. Similarly, more recent federal decisions have likewise expressly recognized that '[t]he right to take fish from the Klamath River was reserved to the Indians when the reservation was created.' (United States v. Eberhardt, supra, 789 F.2d 1354, 1359; see Blake v. Arnett, supra, 663 F.2d 906, 909; Pacific Coast Fed. v. Secretary of Commerce (N.D. Cal. 1980) 494 F.Supp. 626, 632, 633.) And, of course, our McCovey decision also expressly held that the Yurok Indians possess federally reserved fishing rights in the Klamath River which are properly subject to federal regulation. (McCovey, supra, 36 Cal.3d at p.534.)

> Although the People acknowledge that their current contention is inconsistent with the opinions in each of these cases, they argue that because none of the prior decisions expressly considered the particular historical evidence or legal theory on which they now rely, those decisions should not be considered controlling authority. The reach of those decisions, however, may not be so readily circumvented. The issue of the existence of federally reserved Indian fishing rights was directly in question in each of these cases, and the State of California was in fact a principal litigant in several of the proceedings. The People had ample opportunity in the prior litigation to challenge the validity of Indian fishing rights in the Klamath River on the theory they now urge. Having failed to successfully pursue such a legal argument in those cases, they may not avoid the holdings of those decisions at this juncture by resort to ostensibly newly discovered historical evidence or a new legal theory. (See, e.g., Price v. Sixth District Agricultural Assn. (1927) 201 Cal. 502, 522 ['an issue may not be thus split into pieces. If it has been determined in a former action, it is binding notwithstanding the parties litigant may have omitted to urge for or against it matters which, if urged, would have produced an opposite result.'] This is particularly true in a situation, like the present one, where many individuals have relied on the past decisions over a number of years and where a comprehensive federal regulatory scheme - adopted in the wake of the earlier decisions - has been in place for more than a decade. (Cf. Arizona v. California (1963) 373 U.S. 546, 598.)"

The State sought rehearing before the California Supreme Court for the sole purpose of persuading the Court to exclude preclusion on the doctrine of res judicata of the issues it had asserted over the years. The petition for rehearing was denied.

This Court has also held that a federal question may be so explicitly foreclosed by prior decisions of the Supreme Court as to leave no room for a real controversy. Equitable Life Assurance Society v. Brown, 187 U.S. 308, 311 (1902).

This court should find that the final judgments of the cases raised in the California Supreme Court decision below precludes the Petitioner from relitigating issues that were or could have been raised in those actions. Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90 (1980); Bernhard v. Bank of America, 19 Cal. 2d 807 (1942).

II. The Petition Should be Denied Because the Department of the Interior had the Authority to Promulgate Regulations Governing Indian Commerce and Subsistence Fishing in Waters Flowing Through an Indian Reservation Under Authority of its Trust Responsibility to Indian Peoples and Under the Supremacy and Commerce Clauses of the United States Constitution.

Petitioner and Amicus Curiae attempt to define the question raised as a conflict between this Court's decisions regarding the reserved rights doctrine and the California Supreme Court's over-expansion of that doctrine. In reality, the California Supreme Court merely applied a number of concepts laid down by this Court and reached a well founded decision.

When state legislation hinders or frustrates the purpose of federal wildlife regulations the state statutes violate the supremacy clause, Article VI Cl. 2, and cannot stand. United States v. North Dakota, 650 F.2d 911, 917, 458 U.S. 1129 (1983); Washington v. Florida Industrial Comm., 389 U.S. 235, 240 (1967). The United States stands in a trust relationship with ßthe members of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation, and extension thereto, similar to a guardian-ward relationship. Worchester v. Georgia, 31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 515 (1832); Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 1 (1831).

Congress has the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. United States Constitution Article I Section 8, Cl. 3. A state does not own the water within its borders in the same manner as it owns the land underneath those waters. The state's sovereign power to control the use of the water must yield to a valid exercise of federal power. Minnesota by Alexander v. Block, 660 F.2d 1240, 1252, cert. denied 455 U.S. 1007 (1981). A state's control over its resources, including wildlife, does not prohibit the proper exercise of federal power. United States v. Helsley, 16 F.2d 784, 788 (9th Cir. 1979).

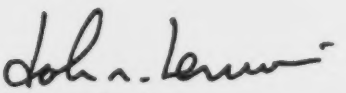
The regulations of the Secretary of the Interior (pursuant to Congressional authority) have the effect of federal law. The rule making authority upon which 25 CFR 258 of the Federal Regulations is based on Title 25 of the United States Code §§2, 9, and 262.

As stated in the California Supreme Court opinion below, the federal government has the authority to provide for the people of the reservation by regulating their primary source of subsistence. Indian commercial fishing is certainly an appropriate area for the federal government to exercise its authority over Indian commerce.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, it is respectfully requested that the Court deny the petition for writ of certiorari.

Respectfully submitted,



dohn r. henion
Attorney for Respondent
Antone Folkins

Appendix A

IN THE JUSTICE COURT OF CALIFORNIA
COUNTY OF DEL NORTE
DEL NORTE JUDICIAL DISTRICT

Action No. 46-19

The People of the State of California,
Plaintiffs,

v.

Diane Mattz et al.,
Defendants.

[Filed June 9, 1982]

RULING ON MOTION TO DISMISS

This matter came on regularly for preliminary hearing in the Justice Court of California, County of Del Norte, Del Norte Judicial District, on Monday, May 24, 1982. Judge P. Timothy Murphy was assigned by the Judicial Council to hear the matter.

The evidence introduced in the preliminary hearing consisted of the testimony of John D. Gavitt, special agent for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. The evidence indicates that all Defendants were, in some manner, involved in the commercial sale of salmon off the Reservation taken from the Klamath River within the Reservation at or about the times alleged in the complaint. At the conclusion of his testimony it was stipulated by District Attorney Robert Weir and defense counsel that all the above-named defendants were and are eligible Fishers and eligible Indians, pursuant to Title 25, Code of Federal Regulations, Section 258.5, i.e., Indian persons entitled to fish on the Klamath or Trinity River within the confines of the Hoopa Indian Reservation and the "Extension," defined as one mile on either side of the Klamath River from the westerly border of the Hoopa Reservation to the sea. At the close of the evidence introduced by the prosecution, all defense counsel joined in a motion to dismiss the action for lack of jurisdiction, in addition to individual motions reflected in the transcript.

The issue presented by the motion to dismiss is whether the State of California can constitutionally pass legislation and enforce laws which control the manner in which Eligible Indian fishermen can dispose of salmon off the Reservation that have been taken from waters within the Reservation.

The parties have submitted extensive briefs, and after a review of the cases cited by all parties and the pertinent federal regulations, this magistrate concludes that the motion to dismiss must be and shall be granted for lack of jurisdiction.

Federal regulations regulating Klamath River fishing by Indians were first issued on August 12, 1977, and in those initial regulations the Department of Interior, Bureau of Indian Affairs specifically reserved the question of whether, absent the regulations, the Indians possessed rights to fish commercially in the Klamath River. Interim rules were adopted on July 13, 1978, which, in part, provide in the preamble:

> . . . Based upon the history of Indian fishing on the Klamath as well as on the substantial case law interpreting federal fishing rights, the Department has concluded that the Indians' reserved fishing right includes the right to use fish for commercial purposes . . .

The federal rules passed in July of 1978, (43 FR 135, pg 30052) specifically provide in Section 258.10 for the method of handling the sale of salmon and steelhead, and also specifically provide for the regulation of fish buyers both on and off the Reservation under Section 258.13. In Section 258.5, as amended, the regulations limited the catching of fish for sale to no more than five anadromous fish per day per person. The regulations were expanded, by the final rules enacted by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, Department of the Interior, on March 20, 1979. These regulations are extremely detailed and, consumptive fishing under subdivision (r). Under Section 258.8(c) commercial fishing was prohibited for that year and the regulations provided for a comprehensive plan and method of enforcement for violation of any of the regulations under Sections 258.14 and 258.15. Section 258.17 specifically provides:

> The Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation Court of Indian Offenses established under 25 CFR Part II has jurisdiction which is limited to trying eligible Indians accused of violating the regulations of this Part and to determine whether nets and other fishing gear were forfeited.

Further regulations were passed in 1980 and 1981 modifying and changing various rules but consistently providing for a penalty on Indian fishers for violation of the rules, including violating the seasonal prohibitions against commercial fishing. Arnett v. 5 Gill Nets (1975) 48 Cal.Ap.3d 454, noted that Indians made their living by commercial fishing in the early years of the century, and further noted that Public Law 280, 28 USC 1360, provides that its application shall not deprive any Indian or tribal band of any right, privilege or immunity under federal treaty, agreement or statute with respect to hunting, trapping, fishing, or the control, licensing or regulation thereof. [Emphasis added.]

The State of California, through Section 8685.5 and 8434, Fish and Game Code, is clearly attempting to control commercial salmon fishing by the Indians of the Hoopa Reservation.

At this time it appears that the three tests to reach this decision, as indicated by the court in People v. Frank, 101CA3d Supp8 (1979), have been met -- especially as it refers to the regulation of the salmon fishery:

(1) The federal regulations are now extremely detailed and comprehensive as to the regulation of the salmon fishing on the Klamath River and it is reasonable to infer that Congress left no room for states to supplement them.

(2) The federal regulations specifically indicate that the commercial salmon fishery by Indians is in fact now regulated in an area exclusively under Federal jurisdiction.

(3) Enforcement of state law does in fact present a serious conflict with the administration of the federal program.

Having ruled that this court has no jurisdiction, it is unnecessary to rule on the other pending motions; and the complaint against the above-named defendants is hereby dismissed.

DATED: June 8, 1982.

P. Timothy Murphy
Assigned Judge

Appendix B

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT
OF THE
STATE OF CALIFORNIA

COUNTY OF DEL NORTE

Action No. 82-053-C

The People of the State of California,
Plaintiffs,

v.

Diane Sue Mattz, et al.,
Defendants.

The People of the State of California,
Petitioner,

v.

Diane Sue Mattz, et al.,
Real Parties in Interest.

[Filed Oct. 4, 1982]

RULING

The Court heard a motion under Section 871.5 of the Penal Code, and a Petition for Writ of Mandate, both brought by the People for the purpose of compelling the Magistrate to reinstate a complaint in Action No. 46-19 of the Justice Court of the Del Norte Judicial District.

The Court proceeded as to all defendants (and real parties in interest) except DIANE MATTZ and RAYMOND MATTZ.

The Court has read the transcript and reviewed the record in the Justice Court.

At the preliminary examination, the Magistrate ruled that, because of Federal preemption, the State court has no jurisdiction. On this basis, the complaint was dismissed (except as to GILBERTA WHIPPLE, whose preliminary examination was not held at that time).

The Federal regulation in effect at the time allowed no commercial fishing for salmon in the Klamath River. Neither Indians nor non-Indians could sell the fish in question either on or off the Reservation. (See People v. Frank, 101 Cal.App.3d 8 (1979).) The Federal regulation contains no express preemption provision. The allegedly criminal acts took place off the Reservation. There is no Federal preemption as to such activity without an express preemption provision (White Mountain Apache Tribe v. Bracker, 448 U.S. 136, 65 L.Ed.2d 655 (1980), footnote 11.).

The Court interprets the action of the Magistrate as being that, because of lack of jurisdiction, he found that no public offense had been committed (Penal Code Section 871). Section 871.5 is therefore an appropriate remedy.

The State does have jurisdiction, and the petition under Section 871.5 is granted. The Magistrate is ordered to reinstate the complaint and resume proceedings.

The Petition for a Writ of Mandate is denied, as the foregoing action renders relief under that theory unnecessary.

DATED: OCTOBER 1, 1982.

_____

Thomas M. Montgomery
Judge of the Superior Court, Assigned

Appendix C

IN THE JUSTICE COURT OF CALIFORNIA
COUNTY OF DEL NORTE
DEL NORTE JUDICIAL DISTRICT

Action No. 46-19

The People of the State of California,
Plaintiffs,

v.

Diane Mattz et al.,
Defendants.

[Filed Oct. 22, 1982]

PROCEEDINGS

All above defendants held to answer in Superior Court as charged.

All above defendants to appear in Superior Court on November 12, 1982 at 8:30 a.m.

Appendix D

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT
OF THE
STATE OF CALIFORNIA

COUNTY OF DEL NORTE

Action No. 82-053-C

The People of the State of California,
Plaintiffs,

v.

Diane Mattz et al.,
Defendants.

[Filed Aug. 26, 1983]

RULING

All defendants challenged the jurisdiction of the Court by way of motions to dismiss, and again in the P.C. 995 motions as to the charges.

The request by the Attorney General that the Court take judicial notice of preferred Exhibits One (1) through Nine (9), and Twelve (12) through Eighteen (18), Twenty-one (21), Twenty-three (23), and Thirty (30) is granted. The offer of the remaining Exhibits Ten (10), Eleven (11), Nineteen (19), Twenty (20), Twenty-two (22), Twenty-four (24), and Twenty-nine (29) is denied.

The preemption analysis did not control questions of the applicability of state law to Indians outside the reservation, (People v. McCovey, 145 CA 3d 190.), and,

Indians going beyond reservation boundaries . . . have generally been held subject to non-discriminatory state law otherwise applicable to all citizens of the state absent federal law to the contrary. (People v. McCovey, Supra 198.) The motions to dismiss are therefore denied.

Each of the defendants joined in the challenge to the record under the provisions of P.C. 995 as to each of them, individually, and the Court having reviewed the record as to each defendant denies each of the motions.

The case is to be calendared for September 16, 1983 at 9:15 a.m. for setting.

DATED: August 26, 1983.

Charles M. Thomas, Jr.
Judge of the Superior Court, Assigned

Appendix E

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT
OF THE
STATE OF CALIFORNIA

COUNTY OF DEL NORTE

Action No. 82-053-C

The People of the State of California,
Plaintiffs,

v.

Antone Folkins, et al.,
Defendants.

[Filed Feb. 17, 1989]

ORDER OF DISMISSAL AS TO DEFENDANTS ANTONE FOLKINS
AND KENNETH MATTZ

The Court has received a peremptory writ of prohibition restraining the Superior Court of Del Norte County, henceforth and forever from any further proceedings on the criminal charges pending against Defendants, Antone Folkins and Kenneth Mattz, except dismissal thereof.

The People of the State of California moved that the Court continue action on the peremptory writ until the end of March so that the U.S. Supreme Court could act upon a petition for writ of certiorari before it regarding the parties hereto. This matter was heard in the above-entitled Court on February 17, 1989 at the hour of 9:00 a.m. The People of the State of California were represented by Charles Gettz. Defendant Antone Folkins was represented by dohn r. henion, Esq. who specially appeared for George Forman, attorney for Kenneth Mattz.

Having considered the matter in the file, including the responses of the parties hereto orally and in writing, the Court

Supreme Court, U.S.
FILED
FEB 23 1989
JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, JR.
CLERK

No. 88-1128

In The Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, Petitioner,

v.

ANTONE FOLKINS, et al., Respondents.

On Writ of Certiorari
to the California Supreme Court

PETITIONER'S REPLY BRIEF

JOHN K. VAN DE KAMP
Attorney General of the
State of California
R. H. CONNETT
Assistant Attorney General

RODERICK E. WALSTON *
CHARLES W. GETZ IV
BRUCE S. FLUSHMAN
MARY E. HACKENBRACHT
Deputy Attorneys General

350 McAllister Street
San Francisco, CA 94102
(415) 557-3920

Attorneys for Petitioner
People of the State of California

*Counsel of Record

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
I. The petition was timely filed.	1
II. The question raised in the petition is one of first impression, and the People are not barred from raising the issue here.	4
III. The controversy is not moot.	9
Conclusion	11

TABLE OF AUTHORITES CITED

Cases

	Page
Aetna Casualty Co. v. Flowers 330 U.S. 464 (1947)	9
Arizona v. California 373 U.S. 546 (1963)	6
Carr v. Zaja 283 U.S. 52 (1931)	9
City Council v. Superior Court 272 Cal.App.2d 876 (1969)	3
Emery v. Pacific Employers Ins. Co. 8 Cal.2d 663 (1937)	8
Jones v. Board of Police Commissioners 141 Cal. 96 (1903)	2
Heflin v. United States 358 U.S. 415 (1959)	3
Louisiana & N.R. Co. v. Behlmar 169 U.S. 644 (1898)	9
People v. McCovey 36 Cal.3d 517 (1984)	5
Preiser v. Newkirk 422 U.S. 395 (1975)	9
Riddle v. Dyche 262 U.S. 333 (1923)	3
United States v. New Mexico 438 U.S. 696 (1978)	6

STATUTES

	Page
California Code of Civil Procedure
§ 21	2
§ 24	2
California Evidence Code
§§ 452(b), (c), (h)	8
§ 459	8
California Penal Code
§ 1238	10

RULE

California Rules of Court, Rule 323(b)	8

No. 88-1128

In The Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1988

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, Petitioner,

v.

ANTONE FOLKINS, et al., Respondents.

On Writ of Certiorari
to the California Supreme Court

PETITIONER'S REPLY BRIEF

The petitioner's reply brief is filed pursuant to Rule 22.5 of the Rules of the Supreme Court.

I. THE PETITION WAS TIMELY FILED.

Contrary to respondents' arguments, Res. Mattz Br., 25-32, Res. Folkins Br. 8-9, the petition was timely filed. A petition for writ of certiorari in a "civil" action must be filed within 90 days after entry of the judgment below. 28 U.S.C. § 2101. The case for which review is sought is a "civil" action because it consists of an original petition for writ of prohibition filed by respondents in the California Court of Appeal. Under California law, "[t]he application for a writ of mandate is a special proceeding of a civil nature." Jones v. Board of Police Commissioners, 141 Cal. 96, 98 (1903) (emphasis added); Deering, "California Administrative Mandamus," § 1.5, at 8.[1/] Petitions for writs of prohibition are governed by the same rules applicable to petitions for writs of mandamus, City Council v.

---

1. Under California law, cases fall into two classes: (1) "actions" and "civil proceedings." Cal. Code of Civ. Proc. (CCP) § 21. An "action," in turn, consists of a "civil" or "criminal" proceeding. CCP § 24. A petition for writ of mandamus, on the other hand, is a "special proceeding of a civil nature." Jones, 141 Cal. at 98.

Superior Court, 272 Cal.App.2d 876, 881 (1969), and therefore a petition for writ of prohibition is also a "special proceeding of a civil nature." A petition for writ of prohibition is similar to a petition for writ of habeas corpus, and this Court has squarely held that a habeas corpus petition is a "civil" action. Riddle v. Dyche, 262 U.S. 333, 336 (1923) ("The writ of habeas corpus is not a proceeding in the original criminal prosecution but an independent civil suit"); Heflin v. United States, 358U.S. 415, 418 n. 7 (1959).

Therefore, the respondents' petition for writ of prohibition is a separate civil proceeding rather than part of the criminal proceeding. Since the petition for writ of certiorari was filed within 90 days after entry of judgment below, the petition was timely filed.

II. THE QUESTION RAISED IN THE PETITION IS ONE OF FIRST IMPRESSION, AND THE PEOPLE ARE NOT BARRED FROM RAISING THE ISSUE HERE.

The respondents argue that the California courts have held on several occasions that Indians have federally-granted "reserved" fishing rights, and therefore that California is barred by res judicata from asserting its reserved rights argument here. Res. Mattz Br. 32-39; Res. Folkins Br. 13. In fact, as the petition and the states' amici brief make clear, the decision of the California Supreme Court below is the first to hold that Indians of the Klamath River have "reserved" fishing rights under federal law. Pet. 7, 15-17; Amici Curiae Brief of States of Alaska, et al., 3-7.[2/]

---

2. In People v. McCovey, 36 Cal.3d 517 (1984), the People asserted that the State has sovereign authority over navigable waters and therefore has the right to regulate Indian commercial fishing in the Klamath River. The California Supreme Court rejected the People's argument by assuming that the Indians have federally-granted fishing rights; on that assumption, the Court then held that the Secretary of the Interior's fishing regulations preempt California law as applied to Indians. Pet. 3 n. 2. Thus, the Court's preemption holding was based on the assumed premise that the Indians have "federally-granted" rights, and that premise is the issue raised here. Since the People raised this foundational issue in McCovey, and since McCovey did not specifically consider or decide the issue, the People cannot be barred by res judicata from asserting the issue in a separate proceeding involving different defendants and different transactions. Moreover, since the Secretary of the Interior's regulations are based on the premise that Indians have federally-granted fishing rights, the validity of the Secretary's regulations depend on whether the Indians in fact have such rights, which is the issue raised here.

In the other cases cited in the respondents' briefs, Res. Mattz Br. 35-36, the reserved rights issue was neither raised nor decided by the courts, and the decisions are devoid of any reference to the issue. Since California has the sovereign right to regulate the Klamath River fish resource unless Congress has Indeed, to our knowledge, no court has ever held that the reserved rights doctrine authorizes the reservation of rights other than water rights. This Court has consistently applied the doctrine as a water rights doctrine only, and has never held or suggested that the doctrine extends beyond the water rights context. E.g., United States v. New Mexico, 438 U.S. 696, 698, 702 (1978) ("water rights"); Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 601 (1963) ("water rights"); Pet. 15-17. Further, the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior issued an opinion in 1891 declaring that the Indians of the Klamath River reservation do not possess

---

"reserved" federal rights in the resource, the Indians' right to fish in violation of California law depends on whether Congress has "reserved" such rights for them. Prior to the decision below, no court has ever decided that question.

"reserved" fishing rights on reservations created after California's admission to statehood. Pet. 14. Additionally, the United States Attorney General issued an opinion in 1891, shortly before the creation of the Indian reservation in this case, to the same effect. Pet. 20.

Therefore, the California Supreme Court decision below is one of first impression, in that no court has ever held that the reserved rights doctrine authorizes the reservation of fishing rights. For this reason, California is not barred from asserting the reserved rights issue here. Moreover, because of the "presumption" that the state retains its sovereign "dominion" over navigable waters and underlying soils, California should not be precluded in any event from asserting its sovereign interests by rules applicable to disputes between private litigants. Cf. United States v. California, 332 U.S. 19, 39-40 (1947) (holding that United States cannot be estopped from asserting jurisdiction over navigable waters within California's territorial limits, even though federal agencies acquiesced in local jurisdiction for many years).[3/]

---

3. Contrary to respondent Folkins' argument, the People were entitled to raise their jurisdictional argument in the Superior Court proceeding to review the magistrate decision, since jurisdictional arguments can be raised for the first time on appeal. Emery v. Pacific Employers Ins. Co., 8 Cal.2d 663, 665 (1937). Moreover, contrary to the respondent's argument that the People are attempting to raise "factual issues" at the appellate level that were not raised below, Res. Folkins Br. 10, the People have the right, in an original writ proceeding at the appellate level, to produce any official documents that can be judicially noticed and that are relevant to the jurisdictional issue. Cal. Evidence Code §§ 452(b), -(c), -(h), 459; Rule 323(b), Cal. Rules of Court.

III. THE CONTROVERSY IS NOT MOOT.

As respondent Folkins notes, the Superior Court dismissed the criminal actions against the respondents on February 17, 1989. Res. Folkins Br. 12. We concede that, if the dismissal of the criminal action renders the matter moot, this Court would lack jurisdiction under Article III of the United States Constitution to review the matter. E.g., Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 401 (1975). The issuance of a lower court's mandate, however, does not destroy this Court's jurisdiction to review the lower court's judgment, even where the mandate has been obeyed. Carr v. Zaja, 283 U.S. 52, 53 (1931); Aetna Casualty Co. v. Flowers, 330 U.S. 464, 467 (1947); see Louisiana & N.R. Co. v. Behlmar, 169 U.S. 644, 648 (1898). The result would be different if, as a result of the lower court's mandate, this Court's decision would have no effect. Such is not the case here, however. If this Court reverses the California Supreme Court's judgment, the California Supreme Court would in effect be mandated to recall its remittitur, and the Superior Court would then be required to vacate its dismissal order. Since a California appellate court has the power to require that a dismissal order be vacated, Cal. Pen. Code § 1238, this Court is not deprived of jurisdiction under Article III by the issuance of such an order. Therefore, the controversy is not moot.

//

//

//

//

//

//

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, it is respectfully requested that the petition for writ of certiorari be granted.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN K. VAN DE KAMP
Attorney General of
The State of California

R. H. CONNETT
Assistant Attorney General

RODERICK E. WALSTON
CHARLES W. GETZ IV
BRUCE S. FLUSHMAN
MARY E. HACKENBRACHT
Deputy Attorneys General

Roderick E. Walston

RODERICK E. WALSTON

Attorneys for Petitioner People of State of California